That this council, like those which were held at later dates, was composed of men of human fallibilities and weaknesses is clearly set forth by the remarks of the distinguished Christian writer and thinker of those times, St. Gregory Nazianzen, in a letter to Procopius, as quoted by Tindal in his work, "Rights of the Christian Church," p. 195. He says that "he fled all assemblies of bishops because he never saw a good and happy end of any council, but that they did rather increase than lessen the evil, that the love of contention and ambition always overcomes their reason." "Nothing," said the same pious writer, "is to be heard there but geese and cranes, who fight without understanding one another."

Tindal's opinion of these councils of bishops is no better than that of the Christian saint whom he quoted. In speaking of the first ecumenical council held at Nice, convened and presided over by the Emperor Constantine in the year 324, he says: "And if these accusations and libels which the bishops at the council of Nice give in of one another to the emperor were now extant, in all probability we should have such rolls of scandal that few would have much reason to boast of the first ecumenical council, when with such heat, passion, and fury the bishops fell foul as one another insomuch that had not the emperor by a trick burnt their church memorials probably they must have broken up in confusion. After that council was over, the bishops made so great a bustle and disturbance, and were so unruly, that the good emperor was forced to tell them that if they would not be more quiet and peaceable for the future he would no longer continue his expedition against the Infidels, but must return to keep them in order." "Indeed," says Tindal, "the confusion and disorder were so great amongst them, especially in their synods, that it sometimes came to blows, as for instance Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavianus, patriarch of Constantinople (at the second synod of Ephesus), with that fury that within three days after he died."

Pappius, a Christian writer of the fourth century, in describing one of the modes by which the many books and writings were decided to be or nor to be the word of God, says on one occasion it was done "by placing all the books under a communion table, and, upon the prayers of the council, the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under." Those who believe in miracles and in the great efficacy of prayer may be able to accept this statement with great joy and confidence, even like unto that which the early Christians of Ephesus evinced when the bishops composing the council then declared that the "Virgin Mary" might be called the "Mother of God." On that occasion the joy reached so great a hight that the people kissed the hands of the bishops, they embraced their knees, and the whole city resounded with acclamations.

After the Council of Laodicea in 363, another was held in 406, and still another in 680. The council of 406 rejectd several books deemed canonical by the council of 363, but the council of 680 again restored them. "Thus," as Cooper says, "were the sacred writings, the word of God, tossed like a battledoor from sect to sect, and altered as the spirit of faction might dictate." "From the close of the seventh century," says the same writer, "to the the fifteenth, when printing was invented, the 'Word of God' remained in pious seclusion. It was locked up in monasteries, in the exclusive possession of monks. The people were forbidden to read it. If they were detected in such an 'impious' act they were punished most severely. The priesthood at this period, therefore, had every opportunity to do what they liked with the Bible—to alter, add, or omit, just as it was most convenient. So greatly, in fact, were the priesthood afraid of the people reading the Bible that a bill was actually introduced into the Parliament [of England] to prohibit any one reading the scriptures except those who were authorized."

After the art of printing became introduced the Bible was printed, and, in spite of the wish of the priesthood, was much more generally read than before; but this, of course, only increased the disagreement in belief concerning it. Christendom was thereby split into different sects, which warred against each other with the bitterest acrimony, which was continued down even to our own time. Luther, the father of Protestantism, rejected the book of James and some others. Calvin and Erasmus strongly doubted the authenticity of Revelations. The Unitarians, with the learned Dr. Lardner at their head, regarded the epistle to the Hebrews, the epistle of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, Jude, and Revelations, as not only doubtful, but as "not fit to be alleged as affording sufficient proof of any doctrine."

The New Testament, as published by the learned Evanson in 1807, contains only the gospel of St. Luke, Acts, ten of Paul's epistles, and Revelations. The other books, the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John, he contemptuously rejected as "spurious fictions of the second century." The Swedenborgians admit only the four gospels and Revelations. Some German sects reject Matthew, and the learned Professor Bauer in 1803 did not hesitate to denounce it as a "forgery." Dr. Eichorn, a learned Bible scholar, rejected the second epistle to Timothy, and Dr. Schleiermacher the first epistle to Timothy. Dr. Bretschneider in 1820 rejected the gospel of St. John, while the first chapter of the gospel of Matthew and Luke were denounced by the Unitarians, as "absolute falsities." The Catholics insist that the Protestant Bible is wholly unreliable and full of error, while the Protestants are equally censorious with regard to the Catholic Bible.

Not a few ridiculous errors of translation have been detected in this so-called word of God, as a specimen of which this will answer: Mark x, 25, speaks of a camel passing through the eye of a needle, whereas in the original was meant a cable rope. The notion of a rope, being an enlarged thread, passing through the eye of a needle is a natural association of ideas, but a camel passing through the eye of a needle is a very awkward, unnatural figure.

The additions that have been made are many and conspicuous. Calmet, the famous Bible critic, declares that 1 John v, 7 and 8, were not in any ancient Bible, the interpolation being an impudent priestly stroke to sustain the doctrine of the Trinity. The last twelve verses of Mark xvi are admitted to have been an addition to what was called the original; and it is the same with many others parts scattered through the gospels, but I will not stop now to point them out. You demurred at my statement that there have been 32,000 different readings of the New Testament, but I now give you the word of an eminent English divine, Dr. John Mill, that after a thirty years' search of the New Testament alone he had found 80,000 different readings of that book, and according to the Unitarian version "there are no less than 150,000 readings of the scriptures, all of which are more or less different." Moreover let me state that it has been proved by a record in the Cronicon of Muis, according to Scaliger and Dr. Mill, that a general alteration of the four gospels took place in the sixth century, by order of Emperor Anastasius, who decreed that "the holy gospels as written, idiotis evangelistis, are to be corrected and amended." "Correct" and "amend" the word of God, indeed!

That the Christian scriptures have been greatly changed, and by different persons, there is abundant Christian proof, far more than I can take the time and space to show you, but I will mention a few instances, taking the following from Robert Cooper, author of the "Holy Scriptures Analyzed:" The learned German, Professor Michaelis, in his Introduction to the New Testament, said, "No one will deny that the early Christians, who differed from the ruling church, have altered the New Testament in numerous examples according to their peculiar tenets." "And so much so," says the Rev. Mr. Nolan, in his "Inquiry," page 400, "that little confidence can be placed in any edition." The Rev. T. H. Horne, in the second volume of his "Introduction to the Scriptures," admits that "all manuscripts, the most ancient not excepted, have erasures and corrections." The Rev. Mr. Pope, in his treatise on the "Miraculous Conception," affirms that "the Cambridge and the Alexandrian manuscripts swarm with corruptions and interpolations." We have the authority of Origen that Celsus charged the early Fathers with having three or four different readings for the same text, or, as he expressed it, "they have altered the gospel three or four different times, as if they were drunk, and, when pressed by their adversaries, recurred to that reading which best suited their purpose." Du Pin informs us that "there is a great discrepancy between the copies, which must be attributed either to the negligence of the scribes or to the audacious perversions of others, or to those who correct the text by arbitrary additions or omissions, who oftentime have put in and left out as they thought it most convenient." There was certainly nothing to prevent this being done to any extent desired. Du Pin adds to this, "It cannot be said that no fault has crept into the scriptures by the negligence or inadvertancy of the transcribers, or even by the boldness of those who have ventured to strike out, add, or change some words which they thought necessary to be omitted, added, or changed."

The learned Mr. James, Librarian of the University of Oxford, in his work on the "Corruption of the Scriptures," on page 372, says: "Let us pass a step or two further and inquire whether they have not corrupted the Bible in like sort, or worse, rather, if it be possible, to a degree of impiety beyond the degrees of comparison, and yet so plainly to be proved against the papists, as he that hath but one eye to see shall plainly discover it, and thence be induced to suspect the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, sitting in the holy place and admiring himself above the Holy of Holies. He shall observe infinite varieties, contrarieties, and contradictions and oppositions between two Bibles, set forth by two popes within two years, both commanded to be read, as are mentioned in the briefs. You shall see the popes breathe hot and cold, say and unsay the same thing twice, and in fine they have truly verified the Bible to be a nose of wax, plied and wrought into fashion for their own advantage. A shame it is that any Christian should presume to add or take away aught from the word of God. Yet oh, intolerable fraud, not any simple Christian or layman, but the bishop of Rome, chief pastor of the church, sole judge of all controversies, whose lips should preserve knowledge, and his tongue speak no deceit, hath audaciously presumed to add and take away whole sentences, to change the words of the holy writ into a clear, contrary meaning—to make, as it were, white black and black white."

The Rev. Mr. Cooper, in his "Tracts," page 521, expressly says, "Were a Socinian to make a new translation, he would translate under the guidance of his Socinian opinions, and properly." The Rev. Dr. Campbell, in his Introduction to his "Translation of the Scriptures," makes some telling remarks about Beza, who published the edition of the Greek Testament, from which our English version is taken: "Here we have a man," says he, "who, in effect, acknowledges that he would not have translated some things in the way he has done if he would not thereby strike a severe blow against his adversaries or ward off a blow which an adversary might aim against him."

This is a frank confession of how the New Testament writings were changed and worked over to meet the arguments of opponents.

And so we go! It requires more astuteness than a Philadelphia lawyer is supposed to possess to arrive at anything like a rational decision as to which is the word of God and which is not. In all probability the only correct conclusion to arrive at is that God had nothing at all to do with the writing of the Bible—the Old or New Testament—any more than he had with the Vedas, the Puranas, the Zend Avesta, the Pymander, the Talmud, the Koran, the Eddas, the Book of Mormon, the Arabian Nights, Gulliver's Travels, and all the witch and fairy myths with which the world has abounded. But in a very few weeks it is highly probable our land will be flooded with the new revision—the new New Testament—and hundreds of thousands of copies will be rapidly purchased to see what the late translators and revisers have done with the revered word of God. And after this new New Testament has been examined, read, and sifted, the intelligent people of this country and of the world will have a more slender opinion of the so-called "Word of God" than ever before. Sensible people are rapidly coming to the conclusion that God does not speak in the books and writings gotten up by partisan priests, monks, zealots, and fanatics, to be quarreled over, distorted, and perverted by other zealots and fanatics, but that the only "Word of God" which is worthy of confidence in that which is recorded is the great volume of nature; in the systems and constellations of the heavenly bodies, in the phenomena presented by the central orb of our system, by the journeyings of our planets around it, of the rocks, stratifications, mountains, valleys, and oceans of the earth, with the mineral, vegetable, and animal productions which belong to it, together with all the laws of nature which the investigations of science are steadily bringing to our knowledge. In all this can be found the only true and reliable word of God, which man cannot get up, change, and modify as best pleases his sinister purposes. When men all grow wise enough to throw away their man-made, man-revered "word of God," and accept this far more beautiful, divine, and unchangeable word of God as found in nature, far better will it be for the world.

THE CHRISTIAN FATHERS.

The fourth division of the third thesis claims that the Christian Fathers were designing, hypocritical, and dishonest; consequently it is but right that I should pay some attention to this branch of the subject. But as it is a somewhat unpleasant occupation to hunt up the failings of others, I will pass it over as briefly as possible.

The Fathers misrepresented the truth greatly as to the authenticity of the gospels and epistles of the New Testament. The oldest manuscripts of these books in existence are not older than the sixth century—five hundred years after the events therein described are said to have taken place. Michaelis, the learned German compiler, says: "The originals of the New Testament have not been seen by any writer extant, nor do they record that any one of their contemporaries had seen them. The holy Fathers themselves do not profess to have seen the originals." . . . "None of the most early Fathers, Ignatius or Tertullian, appeal to the originals, or had seen them." To this may be added the testimony of Du Pin in his "History of the Canon:" "We do not find that the two greatest men of the church, Origen and St. Hieronymus, who had searched the ancient copies of the scriptures with so much care and diligence, have visited so many churches in the East, have ever spoken of the originals of the New Testament, written with the hands of the apostles, which they would not have failed to do if there had been any in their times." Again he says: "In the primitive ages there was no talk of reading the holy scriptures in their originals. Any copy whatever, provided it were used in the orthodox churches, might be relied upon as if it had been the first original written with the hands of the apostles." The Rev. Dr. Campbell, in his work on the "Four Gospels," admits that the originals were nowhere to be found. He confessed, "What we have in their stead are the copies of copies (though how many successors it is impossible to say), which were originally taken from these autographs." Dr. Hay goes still farther when he says, "It is probable there could have been no autographs [originals] of the New Testament at all."

In this truthful view of the case it may easily be seen that a great amount of duplicity, hypocrisy, and falsehood have been palmed off upon the world by these Christian Fathers. They have handed down to us as the genuine works of the apostles that which there is not the slightest proof that one of the apostles ever saw or heard of, or that Jesus or one of the apostles ever left the scratch of a pen behind them. Ample proof of this hypocrisy may be found recorded by Mosheim and other Christian historians. In speaking of the fourth century, Mosheim says: "The interest of virtue and true religion suffered yet more grievously by the monstrous errors that were almost universally adopted in this century, and became a source of immeasurable calamities and mischiefs in the succeeding ages. The first of these maxims was that it was an act of virtue to deceive and lie when by that means the interest of the church might be promoted. The second equally horrible wrong was the production of an incredible number of ridiculous fables, fictitious prodigies, and pious frauds, to the unspeakable detriment of that glorious cause in which they were employed. And it may be frankly confessed that the greatest men and most eminent saints of this century were more or less tainted with the infection of the corrupt principle." Again he says: "It was an established maxim with many Christians to avail themselves of fraud and deception if it was likely they would conduce toward the attainment of any considerable good." Again, "It was considered that they who made it their business to deceive with a view of promoting the cause of truth were deserving rather of commendation than censure." Casaubon, the French Protestant writer, speaking apologetically of "these officious lies," says they were said "to be devised for a good end." Le Clerc, by way of supplementing these opinions, says, "The dissemblers of truth are nowhere to be met with in such abundance as among the writers of church history." Simon acknowledges that the Fathers strove to advance the antiquity of the early writings as much as possible, and that they scrupled not to counterfeit when they had none that were true. M. Daille, a learned writer, in speaking of the Fathers, says they palmed off upon others "what they did not themselves believe," and that they are not to be believed on their own bare word. He again says the Fathers "made no scruple to forge whole books." Upon the authority of St. Jerome he remarks: "Origen, Methodius, Eusebius, Apollinaris, have written largely against Celsus and Porphyry. Do but observe their manner of arguing and what slippery problems they used. They alleged against the Gentiles not what they believed, but what they thought necessary." Jerome adds, "I forbear mentioning the Latin writers, as Tertullian, Cyprian, Minutius, Victorius, Lactantius, Hilary, lest I should seem to accuse others than defend myself."

Proofs of this Christian duplicity and falsehood may be found in abundance by referring to Scaliger, Bishop Stillingfleet, Irenerch, Bishop Fell, Bishop Burnett, Selden, Pezron, Dr. Jostin, Dodwell, Dr. Chapman, Dr. Priestly, and other writers, but I must hasten on. In the Eclectic Review of 1814, p. 479, is this passage: "When we consider the number of gospels, acts, epistles, revelations, traditions, and con-

Thoughts on Religion.—Concluded.

BY AN INVALID, AT THE NEAR APPROACH OF DEATH.

CONTAINING A BRIEF REVIEW OF GOD'S DEALINGS WITH MANKIND AS GIVEN IN THE BIBLE, INCLUDING THE FALL, THE FLOOD, THE TOWER OF BABEL, GOD'S PECULIAR PEOPLE, THE JEWS, THE NEW DISPENSATION, WARS BETWEEN MOHAMMEDANS AND CHRISTIANS, CHRISTIANS PERSECUTING EACH OTHER, SCIENCE AND RELIGION, WITH SOME SUGGESTIONS AS TO A BETTER WAY.

Christ being a part of deity, or all, one in three or three in one, and the book being inspired, whatever he said or did should be perfect and consistent. Let us consider his miracle of the fig-tree; and do not confound this with the parable of the fig-tree, which is very good. The day previous to this miracle he had ridden into Jerusalem on an ass, a colt, or the colt of an ass, as the case may be—for the gospels differ—which might hav been stolen, for it was taken by those who did not own it. It was soon after the raising of Lazarus, and the people were wild with enthusiasm; palm branches, their garments, etc., were spread for him to ride on. One account says he entered the temple, overturned the tables of the money-changers and the seats of those who sold doves, acted as one having authority, and did that which some of those present might take exception to. Another account says he went into the temple, and "looked round about on all things," but did not overturn things generally, as described, until he came back next day.

He went out of the city to Bethany to stay overnight. In the morning, on his way back to the city, he "was hungry," and seeing a fig-tree afar off, on coming to it "he found nothing but leaves, for the time of figs was not yet." The next morning he and his disciples "passed by and saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots." "And Peter said, Behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is withered away."

If such a thing should now be done, would not people be constrained to say none but a simpleton or a lunatic would do this? Just imagin, a person with a dozen followers, strolling through the country, is hungry, sees an apple-tree, for instance, afar off; on coming to it he does not find any fruit, and why? Because the time for apples is not yet. It is May or June, perhaps; so he destroys the tree because it did not bear apples when the time for apples "was not yet."

If a man should destroy a tree because he found no fruit on it at a time of year when trees of that kind did not yield fruit, it would be deemed an act ridiculous and foolish; and if so in man, how much more so in deity! Recently I saw a statement to the effect that the committee now engaged in England in retranslating the New Testament had agreed to reject this miracle of the fig-tree, and there are many other things they may reject with propriety. But if they begin, where shall they stop? and what becomes of the inspiration of the Bible?

Another miracle may be noticed—the casting out of the legion of devils from a man in the country of the Gardarenes. Mark and Luke say there was one man that was possessed; Matthew says there were two. But there was a legion of devils, and he cast them out; they entered a herd of swine that were feeding on the hillside, which so bedeviled them that they all ran down into the sea and perished, two thousand of them. This alarmed the people to that extent that "the whole city came out to meet Jesus; and when they saw him they besought him that he would depart out of their coasts." And it was only natural that they should, for perhaps he might soon commit some act that would be the means of destroying any other or any amount of their property. Two thousand swine were probably worth a considerable sum to those who owned them. Perhaps those revisers will strike out this miracle also. But the better way will be to lay aside the whole book.

This brings me to a consideration of the probable situation of affairs in Judea at that time as affected by the doings of Jesus.

He is represented as doing many strange things—raising the dead, restoring sight, healing the sick, feeding four, five, or ten thousand people with four or five loaves and a few fishes, and a large quantity left.

All this would create much discussion and commotion; some would believe it, and some would not. Those who believed it would seek to honor him by every means in their power.

On the other hand, when he by his acts took unlawfully or destroyed property and assumed authority when the law did not recognize him as possessing any, it would naturally create consternation and distrust.

As in taking the beast (one or more) on which he rode into Jerusalem, his entering the temple and overturning things generally; causing the fig-tree to wither, and the destruction of so many swine, representing a mixture of good and bad that in any community would cause a degree of excitement which would make it necessary for the legal authorities to interfere.

Should a man do similar acts now, probably he would be lodged in an insane asylum. But Jesus came into the world to be crucified, and he had to do something that would seem to justify it. If, as we are taught, he came into the world to die such a death in order that all might not perish but hav everlasting life, why such a stigma on the Jews for doing just what was necessary to save mankind?

But according to Christ himself, as has been shown, only a few are saved; and by the same authority it may seem questionable if even a single person can escape.

I would call particular attention to the last seven verses of the last chapter of Mark, and ask any one who may question the propriety of my assertion that according to the Bible God's plans are a stupenduous failure, to ponder them well, and see if what they read there would not alone justify the assertion.

Christ had appeared to his disciples for the last time, and was about to ascend into heaven; he gave them his last charge, to preach the gospel to every creature, and said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." And now comes the important part; he tells how those who believe may be known. Among other things, he said, "They shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." According to this, is there a single believer in the world? And without believing none can be saved. Christ himself tells with his last words the fate of those who do not believe; and who should know better than he?

In consequence of the great change in public opinion during the recent past in regard to God's decrees, election, predestination, eternal punishment, and many other things of like character in the Old Testament, many eminent orthodox divines are repudiating them, and are teaching the more humane and reasonable doctrin that there is no hell or eternal punishment. But they all tenaciously cling to the New Testament, or the Christ part of the Bible. In view of the quotations and illustrations of Christ himself, which are given, and many more that might be mentioned, it is passing strange how they can pretend to do so with the least show of consistency.

For this reason I will giv just one more instance to show by the words of Christ that they are mistaken and hav no better proof of this from the Bible than they hav for the dogmas of the Old Testament, which they hav acknowledged false, untenable, and unjust. I refer to the last judgment as described by Christ in his parable of the shepherd separating the sheep from the goats. He represents himself as coming in his glory and "sitting on the throne of his glory," with all nations gathered before him. "Then shall he say also unto them on his left hand, depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." In view of this, and the quotations given to prove how few, if any, are saved, why will intelligent men still endeavor to cling to a part of this ignis fatuus, that has led and still continues to lead them only into mists and shadows?

What a picture of inconsistency and failure these things present! An infinite deity, in order that his wrath toward the poor, feeble creatures of his creation may be appeased, givs himself as a sacrifice to satisfy his vengeance, assumes the form of a man, is crucified, and dies the terrible death of the cross, which, awful as it is to man under ordinary circumstances, in this case was enhanced by suffering for the sins of all mankind.

And at last, after all this great sacrifice, according to words from the mouth of this deity himself, it is all of no effect; few, if any, escape the final sentence, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

This devil, that we hav been taught is the cause of all this iniquity, is a very important personage, and if God's omniscient eye from before the creation saw all this, as a result of a living devil, why in the name of humanity and common sense did the great creator, infinit in his power, ever allow him to exist? Will any thinking, reasonable person attempt to giv a consistent answer to this question.

This devil is called the father of liars; but if the Bible anywhere givs an account of his telling a lie, I cannot recall it to mind. He did tell Adam and Eve that if they ate the apple, "Ye shall not surely die," as God had told them they would, but that their eyes would be opened, and "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." God had said, "For in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." It looks as though there might be a lie here somewhere; but if there was, surely the devil did not tell it.

In concluding this part of the subject, I would again call attention to the fact that I hav dealt with it from a Bible standpoint. If there is anything wrong about it, it is the Bible that is wrong. All I ask is a careful, candid consideration of what I hav said.

During all the past history of the world mankind generally hav cultivated to a greater or less extent ideas and opinions called religions; they hav had reference to something mysterious, unknown, and thus far unknowable. It is often said there must be something to worship, because of the natural tendency in man to reverence and worship. It probably arises mostly from the fact that the first great cause we cannot know or comprehend; and of a future life the same state of things must, from the nature of the case, always exist. Every effort thus far in either direction has only led to differences of opinion, without a single step in advance toward real knowledge. This being the case—and what intelligent person, after a candid consideration, will assert that it is not the case?—why will not mankind now see and acknowledge that it is better to expend the vast amount of time, talent, wealth, and physical energy which is and has been given to a fruitless search after the unknown and the unknowable pertaining to creation and a future life in learning how to make this life more enjoyable by studying the principles of justice, benevolence, charity, love, and everything that will tend to make this world approach nearer and more nearly to that which we hav been taught to imagin was the future "land of the blest?" This view would seem to be reasonable, because, as has been shown, the suffering and unhappiness caused by the difference of opinion in matters of religion hav far outweighed and outnumbered the enjoyments.

Many people may be inclined to ask the question, Would you hav mankind giv up all the satisfaction and enjoyment of a belief in deity and a hope for immortality? I would hav each person perfectly free to enjoy and hope for just as much as seemeth to him good in regard to those things. But I would not hav so much time, talent, and money expended in pretending to teach that which even the teachers never hav learned and never can learn.

It is estimated that in the United States there is each year expended the sum of $200,000,000 for theological schools and colleges, the building and maintaining of churches, paying preachers, and other incidentals pertaining to religious teaching. If the number of our needy poor amounts to one in fifty of our population, that sum would be sufficient to giv each one annually the sum of $200, which, it seems to me, would be much better applied in that way than in the imaginary satisfaction gained by hearing expounded Sunday after Sunday, as well as at other times, something that the expounder knows nothing about. If the teachers that these theological institutions of learning send out to the world would qualify themselvs for and lecture before the people on all of the many branches of scientific knowledge, illustrate in an entertaining manner astronomy, mathematics, botany, mechanics, practical agriculture, temperance, with the many other useful and practical realities of every-day life, a great work would be accomplished for the good of people in this life; and if there is—and we hope there may be—another and better life, we shall be all the better prepared to enjoy it.

But religious teachers may ask, Do you not suppose that differences of opinion would arise and exist in the discussion of these practical and useful questions, as you call them? Undoubtedly there would; but most, if not all of them, are and would be capable of being demonstrated and explained in a tangible and definit manner. And those possessing the talent to present the greatest variety of these subjects to the people in the most lucid and entertaining manner would receive the best pay in money and honors. This may be further illustrated by referring to the time when all the vast powers of the church were used to crush out one of the grandest and most intricate scientific problems of the world, which is now universally acknowledged to be correct. I refer to the Copernican system of the motion of the heavenly bodies.

Christianity had been in existence 1,500 years, and had not produced a single astronomer. About the year 1507 Copernicus, a Prussian, completed a book "on the revolution of the heavenly bodies." But on account of the known opposition of the Christian church in Europe, which held that according to the Bible the earth was flat and stationary, the sun and planets revolving around it, he refrained from publishing it for thirty-six years. When published the church condemned it as heretical and utterly contrary to the holy scriptures. For nearly seventy years the matter rested. Then Galileo, a Florentine astronomer, promulgated the same theory, and he was accused of heresy and blasphemy. He was summoned before the authorities for having taught that the earth moves round the sun, a doctrin "utterly contrary to the scriptures." To escape imprisonment he renounced it as a heresy.

On that subject the church again had rest for sixteen years, when Galileo ventured to publish his book on the "System of Worlds." Again he was arrested for heresy, and on his knees, with his hand on the Bible, he was compelled to abjure the doctrin of the movement of the earth. He lived for ten years in prison, and at his death was denied burial in consecrated ground. It is said that when on his knees, with his hand on the Bible, being compelled to deny his theory, he whispered, "It still moves."

Giordano Bruno, an Italian who was educated for the priesthood, after suffering imprisonment at Venice and Rome for eight years for publishing, among other things, a work on the "Infinity of the Universe and of Worlds," and refusing repeatedly to abjure his doctrine, was for that reason burnt at the stake in Rome, Feb. 16, A. D. 1600. What a spectacle was this! A man who could not and would not deny what he knew to be true, with the assurance of a horrible death at the stake, said to his accusers, "You in your hearts are honestly of the same belief as myself."

These are only a few of many illustrations that might be given in proof of the bigotry, intolerance, and cruelty of Bible religionists in their attempts to turn back the current of scientific truths that the intelligence of scientific men has finally forced the religious world to acknowledge as true.

During the past three hundred years science has been steadily and surely removing the dark veil of religious bigotry and superstition that had enshrouded the world.

Science has not only given us definit and tangible proofs of the motions of the heavenly bodies, but also of the attraction of gravitation, the circulation of the blood, the knowledge and application of the power of steam, the science of electricity, and as a result the electric telegraph, with the mighty ocean cables, which in the rapidity of intelligent communication actually outrun time, giving the people of America news from Europe at an earlier hour of the same day than it actually transpires. Also the mighty invention of the power printing-press, that makes printed matter so cheap that the poorest in our land may hav it to their fill. These and hundreds of other scientific inventions hav done much to lighten the burden of labor and make a brighter and better world.

But we cannot say as much for theology. Let us take a little retrospectiv view of that. First, in regard to knowledge of what has been made the all-important question, deity and his attributes. The Jew still believes in and worships his one god Jehovah; the Christian, his triune god, three in one and one in three; the Mohammedan his ever-living god Allah; the Brahmans their trinity of gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; the Buddhists, their one god Buddha, while many other imaginary deities are fixed up to please and punish mankind.

In regard to the real existence of all these, and their attributes, men now differ as widely (if not as much) as they did hundreds and thousands of years ago. And how strange when we consider that in order to settle this great question many of the wisest men that ever lived hav made it the chief study of their lives!

For this nations hav warred against nations until the best and brightest spots on earth, from the Euphrates to the Atlantic, were deluged in blood, and not one jot or tittle of knowledge gained in regard to the matter.

And must we believe that—take the Bible God to illustrate—that he, all this time, has sat on his glorious throne on high, and witnessed this result of his creativ power?

Could he reconcile that state of things with justice by saying, I gave you knowledge, and a "free will" to choose good or evil, the right way or the wrong? But did he do it? Was it not rather the devil that did it? Did not God strive to keep man in a state that he would not know good from evil? It was through the wiles of the devil that the eyes of humanity were opened, and all the knowledge we possess above the brute, except the power of speech, was acquired. And yet, because of this, God, knowing and with his omniscient eye seeing it all, before time began or the first man breathed the breath of life, he having the power to make the result of all things just what he chose, did make it such that Christ, being deity himself, has left on record in his inspired word that from his throne of glory on high he would say to a large part of his creatures, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." What possible object could God hav in forming and carrying out a plan that should hav this result? I can conceive no object unless it be that he might hav the privilege, as it is said in the Bible that he will, to "laugh at their calamities and mock when their fear cometh." Would any being who was not a monster do that?

Then, again, let us see if theology has made progress on other important questions. Is the idea of original sin, or the doctrin of election, predestination, or the atonement, any better understood than when the discussion began? So also with the rite of baptism, on whieh Christians differ so widely. The questions are still unsettled relativ to its being a saving ordinance, or what constitutes baptism, whether a person must be plunged all over under the water, hav some poured on the head, or a little sprinkled in the face. Likewise in regard to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; do the bread and wine become when consecrated by the priest the real body and blood of Christ? And the question of the infallibility of the pope, which divided and still divides "the mother church;" for the Greek church is essentially Catholic except in this. We see that all these that the church has made great questions, after all the discussion both in war and peace, still remain undecided, and that not one single progressiv step has been made that in any way settles these matters. And the simple reason is, it cannot be done.

Thus we see that while science and all matters pertaining to the practical realities of this life, in many instances, in spite of the persistent opposition of the church, has advanced and accomplished much for the benefit of mankind, theology, with all the talent and wealth at its command, has accomplished literally nothing toward solving the great problems that it has discussed, wrangled over, and fought for.

But it may be asked, "If it is proved that these religions that we hav thought so sacred and claimed to hav given so much enjoyment are given up or taken from us, what will you giv, or what can we hav, in their stead? Some might think it a sufficient answer to say that no compensation should be asked for that which is false and of no value. But it is believed that we can do better than that. I would not be so presumptuous as to think myself capable of elucidating a complete theory that should fix a system or standard that would, if followed, accomplish so desirable a object. Probably it could not be done all at once; but, like Topsy in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," I "specks" it must grow. No dogmatic creeds or arbitrary rules can do it.

But if we will only lay old theology aside we shall hav a vast amount of talent and wealth that will be set free to be used for this purpose. Then let these means be used to teach all mankind how to to "be wiser and better every day." Let wise men study how to teach, and men, women, and children try to learn everything that will tend to make us appreciate and enjoy all things pertaining to this life in a better, purer, and happier manner.

To learn how to practice temperance, justice, industry, benevolence, charity, and to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us, should be the object and aim of all. And to do this we should help each other by precept and example all the time. We should not weary in well-doing, nor cease trying to learn how to do well. Discountenance and turn away from enmity and strife and cultivate brotherly love. Be kind and charitable to the sick and afflicted, the poor and the needy. But at the same time giv every one to understand that it is his duty to himself and others to "hoe his own row." The doctrin that "the world owes me a living and I am going to hav it," is false and pernicious. The world owes no man a living unless he tries to earn it. Let every person strive to make this world as enjoyable as he can for himself and others without doing any wrong, and we shall or need suffer no fears of eternal punishment in another or future life. If such a life is in store for any or all of us, it may reasonably be presumed we shall hav all the enjoyment we are entitled to, and the better we liv here the more happiness we shall hav earned a right to there, and justice may be expected to giv to every one his due. Let each and all work out our earthly salvation not with "fear and trembling," but with a resolute, hearty good will, hoping and fearing just as much for the future as is consistent or conduciv to the best enjoyment here in a world that is real, not imaginary.

As to whether there is or is not a future life, we need not discuss it, because, as we hav attempted to show, it is one of those questions that we cannot solve, the discussion of which has given the world no light, and in regard to which no progress has been or can be made. Therefore try to learn how to deal justly with the realities of the life we know we possess.

"Living friendly, feeling friendly,
Acting fairly to all men,
Seeking to do that to others
They may do to me again.
Hating no man, scorning no man,
Wronging none by word or deed;
But forbearing, soothing, serving,
Thus to liv, and this my creed.

"Harsh condemning, fierce contemning,
Is of little moral use;
One soft word of kindly peace
Is worth a torrent of abuse;
Still our hearts with kindness teeming,
Glad when other hearts are glad,
And our eyes a teardrop finding
At the sight of others sad.

"Lend a helping hand to others,
Little recks it where they stand,
How divided into nations,
Scattered over many lands."

Hell or No Hell.

EDITOR News Letter, Dear Sir: After a protracted slumber of seven long years, I was awakened to a consciousness of the injury I was inflicting upon my fellow-man by remaining longer in a state of somnolence by a blast from the brazen theological trumpet of Mr. Moody. It was a rude awakening, and has destroyed all my happiness. Were I the only one to suffer I should make no complaint, but bear my cross like a humble follower of the Nazarene. But numbering, as I do, my congregation by the thousands, and the reading public by the tens of thousands, who hav basked in the blessed light of the gospel truth, as reflected from the illuminating columns of the sanctifying News Letter, I can no longer remain silent, and stand idly by, gazing calmly down the stream of time, and witness the demoralization of the hosts of Jehovah and the destruction of the bulwarks of our faith.

Seven years ago, when I withdrew my regenerated soul from the sin-begetting haunts of the trading world, I laid my mind away in beatific repose, with the firm conviction that somewhere in the near future there existed a magnificent hell; but what a change was presented to my pious eyes on reopening them to the busy scenes ef every-day life!

The Rev. Mr. Moody was blowing through a semi-orthodox horn to a bewildered multitude that modern heresy of no hell! With ruthless, sacrilegious hand he had torn away one-half of my blessed Bible. No hell? And he an expounder of the blessed gospel of the inspired writers—of the word of God! No hell? Shall this itinerant gospel-vender wrench away the corner-stone on which the stupendous superstructure of our glorious religion is founded? Shall the camp-follower on the outskirts of the army of the Lord stand up in our midst, and with unblushing effrontery proclaim the foul heresy of no hell? What is our Christian religion without hell? It is half a pair of scissors—a knife without its blade—a one-legged belief that goes totteriug to its fall. Shall this ring-master of a religious circus rob us of the blissful hope of beholding all those who think differently from us simmering in "fiery hell" through an endless eternity? No hell! It robs heaven of all its charms! Who would wish to sit on a sapphire cloud in Gabriel's court, and sing "The Sweet By and By," unless he could look over the walls of paradise and gaze into hell, and witness the torments of a writhing stock-broker, who had made the last corner in "Alta?" For years I hav amused myself playing hell in my back yard: I would bait a trap with cheese, and label it "Sin," and when an old gray rat would bite at the tempting morsel and get caught in the trap, I would build a fire in a small furnace and slowly roast the rodent over it—myself reclining 'mid a bower of roses in an elevated summer-house, witnessing with a Christian's calm delight the dying agonies of his miniature damnation.

Hav all the martyrs that hav been murdered by the Christan church to please an angry God been sacrificed in vain? We hope not. All the millions who hav been crucified, thumb-screwed, and burned at the stake here, and sent to endless damnation hereafter, are they to miss their destination and go howling through the universe, through all eternity, because some mushroom of to-day has kicked hell out from under them, and left them nothing to stand upon? God forbid! And who told this self-appointed shepherd of the heavenly fold that there was no hell? The Bible states there is a hell! Does Mr. Moody dispute the authority of the Bible? Calvin had a hell, Luther had a hell, Wesley had a hell, Cotton Mather had a hell, and all the popes, through all the centuries, hav thundered hell and damnation from the Vatican at Rome. Is this modern Solomon wiser than his masters? We think not.

The burden of this juvenil evangelist's song is "Come to Jesus; come up, run up, fall up, tumble up; any way to get up—only come." But the reverend gentleman does not tell us where to come to. What do we want of a savior if there is nothing to be saved from? The scheme of salvation is ruined, and the occupation of Jesus gone, if there is no hell. The Christian church has taught through many centuries the dogma of a burning hell. If the church was right once, it is right now. If the church is wrong now, it was always wrong. When did the church lie, Mr. Moody? Did she lie for eighteen hundred years, when she said there was a hell, or does she lie now, when she says there is not a hell? If we lose hell, we lose heaven. If heaven slip from under us, we hav no savior. If the savior fades away, salvation is a myth, and without hell the Christian religion is a stupenduous lie. No hell! What will become of Schroeder, Kalloch, and Wheeler, if there is no hell? What will become of the Board of Supervisors when their term of office expires, and they are out in the cold? Where will the framers of the new Constitution, and the members of the legislature, migrate to when they shuffie off this mortal coil, if there is no burning lake? What will you do with the lobby when they cross the river of Styx, if there is no worm that dieth not? You are wrong, Mr. Moody. Hell? Why, of course there is a hell.

And, my poor friends, you are treading the downward road and don't know it. Shall we wipe out the beautiful embellishments of "Paradise Lost" by ignoring hell? Shall we ruin the fame of Dante by throwing cold water on his "Inferno?" Shall we? Shall we destroy one-half the literature of the world by sweeping hell from its pages? No. We can't afford it. Without hell we should hav a religion that offers a premium to crime.

stitutions which were put in circulation during the first three centuries, and which are unquestionably spurious, we find sufficient reason for examining with care and receiving with extreme caution productions attributed to eminent men in the primitive church. Some of the early Christians do not appear to have possessed, in some points, a very high sense of moral obligation. The writing of books under false names, and the circulating of fables were not accounted violations of duty, or if the impropriety of such conduct was felt, the end proposed—the promotion of the Christian cause—was thought to justify the means employed for its accomplishment."

I will take the time to mention only a few of the dishonest traits of the distinguished early Fathers, agreeing to furnish the proofs hereafter if you call for them.

First, Origen, who is perhaps the most important of all the Fathers; he was one of the first to collect the books of the New Testament. He had not a strict regard for the truth; he was unfair toward his antagonists; he used unjustifiable means to serve the cause he advocated.

Next, Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, an eminent early Christian authority. He extolled falsehood to be a virtue, and held that it should be employed when necessity called for it. He agreed with Paul when he said of himself, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile," and, "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" He also believed in suppressing the truth where he thought it would be impolitic to speak it. Baronius, a sincere man, calls Eusebius the "great falsifier of ecclesiastical history, a wily sycophant, a consummate hypocrite, a time-serving persecutor who had nothing in his known life or writings to support the belief that he himself believed in the Christian system."

Of Irenæus I have already spoken, and of his absurd, silly, sophistical arguments for the existence of four gospels and his gross disagreement with them about the period of Jesus's preaching. He must be set down as dishonest or very silly, and the whole story as ridiculous.

Dr. Whitby accuses Father Papias as "having scandalously deluded the world with fables and lying narrations."

Of Justin Martyr I quote Mosheim, "Much of what Justin says is wholly undeserving of credit."

Of Clement of Alexandria and Lactantius the Rev. Mr. Jones, in his "New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament," says it was their practice "to make use of testimonies out of forgeries and spurious books to prove the very foundation of the Christian revelations."

The venerated St. Jerome, who got up the Vulgate or Latin translation of the Bible, said, "I do not find fault with an error which proceeds from a hatred toward the Jews and a pious zeal for the Christian faith."

Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople, said to Father Jerome: "A little jargon is all that is necessary to impose upon the people—the less they comprehend the more they admire. Our forefathers and doctors of the church have often said not what they thought, but what circumstances and necessity dictated to them."

Bishop Heliodorus, in his "Romance of Theagues and Chronicles," uses this language, "A falsehood is a good thing when it aids the speaker and does no injury to the hearers."

St. Synesius declared: "The people were desirous of being deceived. We cannot act otherwise respecting them." Again, he said, "For my own part, to myself I shall always be a philosopher, but in dealing with the mass of mankind I shall be a priest."

"The great and good St. Augustine," one of the very fathers of Christianity, in his thirty-third sermon, made the monstrous assertion, upon which he staked his soul's salvation, and which he said was "as true as the gospel," that "when he was bishop of Hippo Regius, he preached the gospel of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ to a whole nation of men and women who had no heads, but had their eyes in their bosoms; and in countries still more southerly he preached to a nation amongst whom each individual had but one eye, and that situated in the middle of the forehead."

Constantine the Great, who did more than any other man to bring Christianity into notice and to make it powerful and respectable, must not be omitted in this brief review of the Fathers.. But, unfortunately, he was a murderer of the deepest dye. He unscrupulously murdered his own blood relations lest they might become competitors for his power. His slaughter bill and his victims are briefly stated as follows: 1. Maximian, his wife's father; 2. Bassianus, his sister Anastasia's husband; 3. Lucinianus, his nephew by Constantina; 4. Fausta, his wife; 5. Sopater, his former friend; 6. Licinius, his sister's husband; 7. Crispus, his own son.

I will close the review of these dishonest Fathers by quoting from St. Hermas, who is said to have been a fellow-laborer of St. Paul, who himself as shown seemed to think very favorably of lying and deceit. Thus said St. Hermas in his gospel, "O Lord, I never spake a true word in my life, but I have always lived in dissimulation, and affirmed a lie for the truth, and no man contradicted me, but all gave credit to my words."

I could go much farther in this direction, but I need not, and have not space. I will stop to make no comments, but only that these are the Fathers from which the world has received the gospel of Jesus Christ. These are the men who have told us what he said and did, and about his immaculate conception, about his impossible miracles, and about his physical resurrection and ascension into heaven. What is it all worth, and how much truth is there in it all? In my opinion, it is worth very little, and that there is precious little truth in the whole thing.

I must defer the examination of our fourth thesis till my next. Yours truly. D. M. B.

Editorial.

A Growing Demand.

One day this week we had occasion to visit the magnetic-garment establishment of Wm. C. Wilson, in Brooklyn, partly to obtain goods to fill orders we had received, and could not help being struck with the lively demand which seems to exist for his curativ goods. We saw three carriages in waiting at the door and several persons in the waiting rooms, hoping for an interview and to obtain a remedy for the ailments with which they are afflicted. Among those present were Thurlow Weed and his daughter. Few men hav been better known or wielded more influence in this country than has Mr. Weed. He was for many years a prominent editor, and has been called the father of the Whig party, which merged into the Republican, and with considerable truth was it said that he made both governors and presidents. But Mr. Weed has become an old man, having seen eighty-three years, and the infirmities of age very naturally weigh upon him. His mind retains its nativ vigor, but his tall form bends and totters not a little with his many years.

A distinguished personal friend, who had received much benefit from the magnetic appliances, had induced Mr. Weed to make trial of the same, and he selected a full set, including the various garments. We saw the goods as they were being packed, and Mr. Weed's check for $120.00 which he paid for them. He seemed to indulge much hope, and before leaving the establishment he remarked that if he found the appliances benefited him he would send over Peter Cooper to obtain a set of them. We heard it also said that Samuel J. Tilden is about to try the magnetic appliances for the paralytic difficulty under which he labors.

Despite the cry of "fraud" and "humbug" which it is always easy to raise over every new claim which is set up, it seems that distinguished persons are not only very willing to use Wilson's magnetic appliances, and what is better, that a very large proportion of those who use them are materially benefited. Prominent among these is another old man, Dr. James V. Mansfield, than whom but few men are more widely known all over this land. He has worn these garments and givs the effect of his experi ence with them, one of his letters reading as follows:

61 West Forty-second street,
New York, April 4, 1881.

Wm. Wilson, Sir: Having used your "Wilsonia" appliances I am pleased to add my testimony to their wonderful curativ effects in my case.

For more than eighteen years I hav been afflicted with partial paralysis, as well as almost constant rheumatism, and for the the last ten years I hav not been able to walk up or down stairs without steadying myself with the banisters, and not at any one time able to walk more than one-fourth of a mile.

But from the use of your appliances I was able to walk fully one mile the first day wearing the "Wilsonia," and to-day I can walk three miles without the slightest difficulty. I hav not experienced the slightest trouble from rheumatism since wearing your appliances. I do believe any case of rheumatism (however aggravating) will yield under your treatment. I hav such implicit confidence in the efficiency of your manner of treating disease that I hav sent your circulars to several of my afflicted friends, and feel quite sure you will hear from them at an early day.

Will you be kind enough to send me a quantity of your circulars that I may distribute them among those of my friends who hav been and now are similarly afflicted? I sent your representativ, 695 Broadway, a customer to-day, and sent him several last week. When you next visit your Broadway department just drop in and see how nimble an old broken-down man has become from wearing the "Wilsonia" only ten day. Respectfully, James V. Mansfield.

At a later date, feeling an exuberance of gratitude for the benefit he had received, he penned as follows:

61 West Forty-second street,
New York, April 9, 1881.

Dear Wilson: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "Wilsonia" as I do.

Mrs. Mansfield has been, and now is, under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain. Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not had it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called upon Mrs. Mansfield this morning, and her theme is the "Wilsonia."

I hav sent your representativs on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you must dress them as you deem prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a thousand dollars' worth of customers this year.

God bless you, dear Wilson, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.

Respectfully, J. V. Mansfield.

It is not aged people alone who are benefited by these appliances. All ages seem to be equally amenable to their gentle influence. We have seen a child less than a year old whose mother informed us that it was ill from birth, and for two or three months it cried much of the time, and two persons were occupied most of the time in attending to it. Mr. Wilson, learning the condition of the infant, sent some of his appliances, which were at once put upon the little sufferer, and the effect was immediate and most favorable. It ceased to cry, and seemed to become a healthy babe. It was six months later when we saw it, and it had the appearance of a healthy child, and seemed unusually good-natured. The mother gave the assurance that she had kept some of the garments on the child, and that it had never cried since they were put on. The father made the same statement.

It is hardly to be wondered at that a new remedy like this should meet with opposition and condemnation from the medical faculty. Many physicians are crying out against the "Wilsonia," but this may be taken as a good indication rather than otherwise. This opposition to anything that interferes with the old order of things was thus recently manifested. Mr. Wilson has for some time been advertising his magnetic goods in the Christian at Work, a religious weekly of a pretty wide circulation, whereupon in deference to the prejudice of family physicians several of its readers addressed letters to the editor, Mr. J. N. Hallock, to the import that if Wilson's advertisment was continued in his paper they would discontinue taking it. It is said that nearly a hundred letters of this kind were received. (Possibly the fact that Mr. Wilson is an outspoken Liberal had something to do with it.) Upon receiving these letters Mr. Hallock deemed it his duty to look into the matter. Taking a carriage, accompanied by his wife, he called upon a considerable number of the persons who are wearing the goods, and the report was so uniformly favorable that he was surprised, as may be seen by the following, which is clipped from his paper of the 7th inst:

"Mr. Wilson advertises his 'Wilsonia' in another column. We hav made many inquiries of those using his goods, and in every case the results are favorable, and those who are wearing the garments say they are greatly benefited. Facts are stubborn things, and the references will be given by addressing a postal to 'Wilsonia,' 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn. These names comprise many of our best men and women. The well-known artist, Mr. Littlefield, at the Phœnix Building, Brooklyn, indorses them heartily."

It is only necessary to add that Mr. Wilson's advertisment is still kept in the Christian at Work, and that the people are still buying the goods and being cured.

We do not propose to go wild over "Wilsonia," but having upon thorough investigation found them doing many persons great benefit, and believing that helping to ameliorate the ills of the body is in perfect keeping with freeing the mind from the evils of superstition and error, we accepted the agency for the sale of the magnetic goods, and we hav not the slightest doubt that we will be able to do much good in this way. We hav received a large number of letters, and hav already sent out several sets of the garments. As reports are received from those wearing the goods, the same will from time to time be laid before our readers.

It is not to be expected that these appliances will cure all the ills to which flesh is heir, or that the old are to be made young, or that the dead are to be brought to life by their application. Death will doubtless still continue in the earth. But very many of the ailments with which the race is afflicted can be removed by them; and this is what makes us willing to sell them. Their use can do no harm, and if by them the use of drugs and poisons can be lessened and the aches and pains of the body and the consequent gloom and unhappiness of mind be removed, much good will be accomplished.

Good Work in the West.

Liberal lecturing among the pines of northern Wisconsin is flourishing. W. F. Jamieson is now on a very successful tour there. Of his first lecture in Merril the Wisconsin News of April 8th, contains the following: "Prof. Jamieson delivered the first of a series of five lectures at the schoolhouse last night, upon Freethought subjects, to a fair-sized and attentiv audience. The Professor is a good talker and a fine reasoner. There will be another lecture given this evening at 8 o'clock, one Saturday at the same hour; the fourth lecture will be delivered Sunday at 2 P. M., and the last Sunday evening at 8 o'clock."

The second lecture was largely attended, every seat nearly being occupied and some standing. The schoolroom is large and pleasant. The people are enterprising, most of them well educated, thoughtful, and, of course, Liberally inclined.

Mr. Jamieson requests us to say that after the 1st of May he prefers calls for the northern part of Michigan, as he contemplates spending the summer there. Address him at Albion, Mich.

MRS. COLBY and Mrs. Smith having successfully closed their engagement in Cleveland, will visit New York and Boston the last of April, remaining in that vicinity during May and June. Parties wishing their services can address them (until further notice) care TRUTH SEEKER office, New York.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Eighth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As I wrote you, I do not think it necessary to take up your reply to my eighth letter, although in many places I consider that you have laid yourself open to serious attack. I am more anxious to place before the reader what I regard to be the truth and leave it to his honest criticism than to have the last word. He will appreciate that your repetition does not strengthen your argument, and that because I silently pass over many assertions it is not because I admit them or deem them impossible to overthrow. Thus you assert, and defy me to prove the contrary, that Paul never heard of the physical resurrection of Jesus Christ!!! Yet it is this same Paul who writes in an epistle acknowledged on all hands to be genuine and referred to by name by his contemporary Clement: "I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures; and that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve; after that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain unto the present, but some are fallen asleep. After that he was seen of James; then of all the apostles. And last of all he was seen of me also. . . . . Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen, and if Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ. . . . But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept" (1 Cor. xv). To such extreme rashness of assertion Infidel bias can lead! But to refute every blunder like this would take time and patience which I do not possess, and would be but little compliment to the intelligence or honesty of the reader.

I see that you still deny the genuineness of the gospels and reaffirm the equal importance and trustworthiness of the apocryphal books. But you have not explained why Celsus and Porphyry admitted them to be genuine; why Cerinthus, the contemporary of the apostle John received the gospel of Matthew; why the Ebionites of the same day also received the same book, making, however, many alterations in it to suit their theories. Both rejected the other three gospels, it is true, but neither denied their genuineness. You have not explained why it is only these four gospels and no others that are quoted as authority by all the ancient heretics, thus agreeing in this respect with the orthodox Christians. As I have said before, I think I have given conclusive proof of the genuineness of the gospels, and that they were received by the early church fresh from the hands of their accredited authors.

However, I will examine with some minuteness your last letter. You say: "From what I have already said I think I have made it pretty clear that neither Jesus nor his disciples wrote any of the books of the New Testament, unless possibly it was the first epistle of Peter, which some Christian writers will insist was written by Peter, although it is a matter of extreme doubt. Some of the epistles ascribed to Paul were undoubtedly written by him, while others were almost certainly not written by him. The four gospels were assuredly not written by those whose names they bear, and no one in the world knows who did write them."

Well, of course I have never asserted that Jesus ever did write any of the New Testament scriptures. We are extremely grateful for the straightforward acknowledgement that Paul did, beyond a doubt, write some of the epistles ascribed to him, and for the admitted possibility in regard to the Petrine authorship of the first epistle of Peter. What, however, is the proof you offer which makes it "pretty clear" that the rest of the books of the New Testament are forgeries? Just this: There were, as Luke records in his gospel, a great many so-called gospels in the first century of Christianity—of the scraps of Christian writings of that time that have escaped the almost universal destruction of the literature of that period; Irenæus, who was bishop of Lyons, having succeeded the martyr Pothinus about A.D. 170, is the first to remark that there were only four canonical gospels; a quotation from the Rev. John Chadwick, a townsman of mine, a man of shallow scholarship; of some flippant remarks about the book of Acts, another from the historian Mosheim about the credulity with which forgeries were received some centuries later; some doubts of Dr. Middleton, an eighteenth-century rationalist; quotations from Judge Waite's crude criticisms, supported by the more scholarly, although no more reliable, authors of the "Creed of Christendom" and "Supernatural Religion." To this I have opposed the testimony of Irenæus, who, in the few remaining books we have of what once formed almost a small library, testifies to every book in the New Testament except the short letters to Philemon, the third epistle of John, and the letter of Jude—giving in detail his history of the origin of the four gospels; a series of quotations from Christians living from his time backward to the apostolic age, some of them being fellow-laborers with the apostles, whom you alleged had no knowledge of the gospels, Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Polycarp, Ignatius, etc.; the fact that, beginning with Cerinthus, who lived in the time of the apostle John, he and all the ancient heretics of the first and second centuries referred to the four gospels, and to them only, as being the authoritative lives of Christ, and never denied their genuineness, although a denial of it would have benefited their cause above any other conceivable argument; the fact that Celsus, Porphyry, and the Emperor Julian, who had ample opportunities to determine, never made such a charge, although they wrote against Christianity, together with a brief consideration of the impossibility of such a forgery being palmed upon the early Christians, who surrendered their lives amidst the most harrowing tortures rather than forego their belief in these books, their jealous care in guarding against mistakes, the rapid diffusion of copies of the precious manuscripts, and the other considerations briefly gathered in my last letter. I submit that in the face of this you have hardly made your case "pretty clear."

After elaborating the frequently repeated and conceded fact that there were many "so-called gospels floating around, one ascribed to this apostle or saint, and another to that, probably not one of them actually bearing the name of the person who wrote it" (the reader may notice that in treating the alleged authorship of the apocryphal gospels the criticism is merely a probable negative, but in the case of the canonical gospels it is a dogmatic assertion of forgery against the uniform belief of centuries), you continue: "Among all these conflicting claims of authorship, each gospel and epistle having had its special partisans and advocates, some mode must be devised as to which among them all should be recognized and accepted as the genuine article and which should be rejected as spurious and false. Many bitter and serious contentions grew out of the conflicting claims set up by the advocates or these numerous gospels and epistles, the priests, bishops, archbishops, and even the popes participating in these persistent quarrels. Pope Gelasius distinguished himself by condemning and pronouncing false many of these writings which many before him had considered genuine and worthy of credence. In the latter part of the fifth century he did quite a business at pronouncing false a large number of gospels giving incidents in the life of Jesus and describing the miracles which he performed."

This certainly appears like manufacturing history. There is no proof, and even if there were, as to the redoubtable prowess of this iconoclastic pope, I fail to see the relevancy of it when you have admitted that the New Testament canon was really formed two centuries previously.

You go on to quote Rev. Samuel Davidson that "oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge," although on what grounds he made this dubious assertion we are left to ascertain for ourselves. But a modern name, even introduced by a ministerial prefix and made euphonious by the title "D.D.," is not authority sufficient to contradict the gospel writers' claims to be eye-witnesses and companions of the apostles of Christ. Although this reverend critic is very sure that the "exact principles that guided the formation of a canon in the earliest centuries cannot be discovered," he is equally certain in the next sentence that "definite grounds for the reception or rejection of books were not very clearly apprehended. The choice was determined by various circumstances, of which apostolic origin was the chief, though this itself was insufficiently attested, for if it be asked whether all the New Testament writings proceeded from the authors whose names they bear, criticism cannot reply in the affirmative. The example and influence of churches to which the writings had been first addressed must have acted upon the reception of the books. Above all, individual teachers here and there saw the necessity of meeting heretics with their own weapons, in their own way, with apostolic records instead of oral tradition. The circumstances in which the orthodox were placed led to this step, effecting a bond of union whose need must have been felt while each church was isolated under its own bishop and the collective body could not take measures in common. Writings of more recent origin would be received with greater facility than such as had been in circulation for many years, especially if they professed to come from a prominent apostle. A code of apostolic writings, divine and perfect like the Old Testament, had to be presented as soon as possible against Gnostic and Manichean heretics, whose doctrines were injurious to objective Christianity, while the multiplication of apocryphal works threatened to overwhelm genuine tradition with a heap of superstition. . . . The formation of a Catholic church and of a canon was simultaneous. The circumstances in which the collection originated were unfavorable to the authenticity of its materials, for tradition had been busy over them and their authors. Instead of attributing the formation of the canon to the church it would be more correct to say that the important stage in it was due to three teachers, each working separately and in his own way, who were intent upon the creation of a Christian society which did not appear in the apostolic age—a visible organization united—when the discordant opinions of apostolic and sub-apostolic times should be finally merged. The canon was not the work of the Christian church so much as of the men who were striving to form that church, and could not get beyond the mold received by primitive Christian literature. The first mention of a 'Catholic church' occurs in the martyrdom of Polycarp, an epistle that cannot be dated earlier than A. D. 160, and may perhaps be ten years later. But though the idea be there and in the Ignatian epistles, its established use is due to Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian." Mr. Davidson besides adducing this on his mere ipse dixit, at least as you quote him, becomes suddenly garrulous after having declared that he knows nothing. He is a decided Spencerian and certainly deserves recognition from that philosopher who declares God to be unknowable and inscrutable and then writes a dozen volumes about him to prove it. You promised, however, to furnish me proof, sir, and not mere assertion.

To this you attach several untenable assertions of your own, which being equally devoid of proof I will not quote. Then follow some quotations from Dr. Whiston, Rev. James Martineau, and Archbishop Wake. I am afraid you have misquoted the latter. However, what if Whiston, who was an Arian, did receive many writings as inspired which were not? Why is he not just as acceptable authority to you on a certain passage in Josephus when after laborious study on it and the evidence pro and con for its genuineness he pronounces it genuine? And what if Dr. Martineau cannot understand why Mark and Luke are inspired if Clement and Barnabas were not? One who is so blinded that he cannot see that Christ is taught in the New Testament to be divine, may be excused for blindness in lesser matters. Your proof is very suspicious when its strength consists in the unsupported theories of modern Arians, Rationalists, and Unitarians; and even if Bishop Marsh did say that "it is an undoubted fact that those Christians by whom the now rejected gospels were received, and who are now called heretics, were in the right in many points of criticism, where the Fathers accused them of wilful corruption," it proves nothing against the genuineness of the New Testament. You are aware that Bishop Marsh elaborately proved their genuineness, and his proof is incapable of being overthrown. It is scarcely legitimate to transfer a quotation from its proper surroundings to make it seem to affirm that which was the directly opposite of the writer's intention.

You allege further that "from the first century to the seventh there was no fully-authorized canon of the New Testament writings. There were many claimants, and doubt and uncertainty hung over all, when, if there was any truth and reliability attached to those early writings, it would seem they ought to have been certain and satisfactory. It is indeed singular that, if doubt existed about those books then, they should be wholly undoubted and reliable now, and that there is any process by which doubt and falsehood can become certainty and truth. The strength of faith must indeed be great."

"The Champions of the Church."

It is a full and complete exposure of an institution founded upon fear, and which flourished by taking advantage of that feeling and never allowing it to die out. I should think a perusal of it would shake any Christian's faith in the beneficence of a church which in its inception and prime was but a corporation of murderers.—E. M. M. to a friend.

Communications.

My Trip East.—Concluded.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

LYNN, MASS.

In the home of Mr. and Mrs. Todd I received a cordial welcome. Myra, Hanni, and little Gracie Todd seem like my own sisters.

Many happy days hav I whiled away since 1874 in the society of this harmonious family, every member of which is interested in Liberal and reformatory themes, discussing them with avidity. They are activ workers in Rev. L. K. Washburn's Free Religious Society. Their sympathies incline considerably toward the Spiritual theory.

One evening in the home of the Todd family it was my very great privilege to enjoy the polished and instructiv conversation of that Abolitionist and most devoted friend to humanity,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

He is still in the lecture field and is one of the finest platform speakers of this age. Why Mr. Pillsbury is not constantly engaged to appear before every Liberal society in the land is hard to account for. Did the church own him he would be passed from church to church, with copious benedictions, as a living monument of God's grace in keeping the noted Abolitionist so young and so eloquent. It must be that the Liberal Leagues are not aware that they can obtain the inestimable services of this champion of freedom without the outlay of a mint of money; but this is a mistake. With Mr. Pillsbury the matter of money is a secondary consideration. Every village and city ought to hear his lectures with their wealth of thought, and especially those entitled, "The French Revolution of 1793 and its Lessons to the Nations"—two lectures. He also givs an address on "Thomas Paine in the Revolution of 1776." And everywhere should his lecture, "One more Side of Temperance—the Under Side," be heard.

While in Lynn I heard Mr. Washburn on "The Moral Demands of the Age," a very fine discourse. This gentleman is building up a flourishing society, notwithstanding opposition from the pious.

HARTFORD, CONN.

I had a debate here with Moses Hull. Hartford is a beauty among cities. Thrift, cleanliness, and wealth abound. Happiness is the rule and misery the exception.

AT VINELAND, N. J.,

I had a debate with Moses Hull. My stopping-place was with my old Spiritualistic friends, John and Portia Gage. Mr. Gage is a genuin lover of science, which makes what Spiritualism he has a sensible sort of doctrin. He says he does not absolutely know that he will liv after death, but thinks the preponderance of proof is in favor of future existence. In appearance Mrs. Gage reminds one of Martha Washington — fully as handsome. Few women of her age are as fine-looking.

The attendance at the Vineland debate was very small.

LINESVILLE, PA.,

Had a great celebration of Thomas Paine for three days. A few years ago I held my debate with Rev. A. N. Craft, a Methodist clergyman from Cleveland. In the boasting manner of many of the clergy he prophesied that, as a result of the debate, the Liberal League, only fairly organized, would be killed dead beyond the hope of resurrection. The two clergymen, Rev. Mr. Luce and Rev. A. A. McMaster, who were Mr. Craft's seconds, are now outside of any regular Christian church, and a more prosperous Liberal League I never knew. Every year their meetings hav grown in interest and in attendance. This year the Opera Hall could not hold the crowds that sought admission, and there was exacted a small fee at every session. To the business energy of Mr. Geo. W. Baldwin and other members of the League is the prosperity largely due. Mrs. H. S. Lake, one of the very best lecturers on the American platform, was secured.

There were nine sessions debate between Mr. Hull and myself, five sessions between Elder Clark Braden and the the writer on Thomas Paine. Elder Braden presented himself as a retailer of slanders against Paine. After the second night his moderator abandoned him entirely, and nearly every Christian did the same, and poor Braden was left at our mercy! His bombast became thin as bombazine. Moses Hull said Clark Braden was willing to stand up and be kicked all day at ten cents a kick! Bright boy, that godson of mine! Moses employed one day in battering Braden on greenbacks. (Confidential.—I am not authorized by Moses to say it, but he finds mauling Materialism is the hardest work he ever did.)

Mr. Braden is a man of considerable power, but he spoils his own efforts as a debater by indulging in vicious denunciation of his opponents. Mr. Hull is an exceedingly keen, good-feeling debater, and one of the most interesting in the controversial field. His principal difficulty consists in not stating accurately his opponent's positions.

GARRETTSVILLE, OHIO.

In this thriving Buckeye town I hav always had splendid audiences at my lectures, having given two courses, one of five, in the spring of 1880, and a second series of seven lectures, in February, this year. Mr. George J. Streator is the successful manager of the lectures which I hav given there. Mr. Luther, the Crane brothers, and Squire Ferris are all outspoken Freethinkers. Mr. A. G. Smith is a Liberal Spiritualist. Mr. Streator devotes most of his time to the cultivation of flowers and small fruits, and is a very activ Liberalist. I first had the pleasure of his acquaintance while delivering some lectures away up at Frankfort, in northern Michigan. Mr. Streator told me those were the first Liberal lectures he ever heard. He went home full of enthusiasm, determined to hav me giv lectures in his own town. His experience was that of many others. Said he, "Those are my sentiments, only I did not know what to call them!"

Looking back over my twenty-one years' work for Liberalism, I hav reason to be thankful for the many warm friends I hav made. Notwithstanding the petty oppositions from a few would-be reformers, a great deal of sunshine, with a trifle of cloud, has been my portion. From the orthodox in every town a solemn shower of curses falls to my share. After so many years of continuous condemnation I would feel a little lonesome without the customary benedictions of the rigidly righteous.

ALBION, MICH.

My wife stopped here to visit her relativs, while I went East. In Albion she was born. In Albion, a girl of eighteen attending the Methodist seminary, I, a stripling of nineteen, captured her—my first and greatest victory. There we were married, and from Albion I started abroad to promulgate my antichristian views. On the 15th day of next October it will be twenty-five years since we started as wife and husband in the journey of life. A few of these years we hav had the pleasure of each other's society. Every few months I look forward to the visit home. My part of the itinerant work has been more pleasant than hers. Everywhere I hav met with new acquaintances, made new friends, had the exhilaration of audiences every day, two hundred days on the average every year. Busy hav I been with the battles of ideas, in the lulls of which I hav read papers, written letters, read books, studied the best authors, sought for truth at first hand by questioning nature with experiments.

In the meantime the faithful little wife was occupied with the care of children, and house-keeping duties in general; many and many a day, week, month dragging their weary length along, and into which was pressed many a lonely hour, such as I suppose only a woman can feel. I do hope we may both liv to celebrate our silver wedding on the 15th of October, 1881.

We are not rich in this world's goods; $1,000 would more than cover my twenty-one years' lecturing profits. Nevertheless, we are cheerful and are happy. A younger pair than Mrs. Jamieson and myself are not to be found in the United States of America, of our age and size. We hav been grandparents, too, for four or five years. Our two girls were sensible enough to marry Liberals; both husbands are young, industrious, practical, workingmen.

Really, as I write these lines, I begin to think I ought to feel old, but I do not; indeed I feel like a beardless youth of twenty.

Perhaps the reader's pardon ought to be solicited for obtruding my family affairs upon the public notice. But my friends everywhere will bear me witness that it has been my invariable custom to seldom refer to my personal matters. Surely, as a man of twenty-one years of public life in an unpopular calling, and as a grandfather, part owner of the three finest grandcherubs in Michigan, I hav some privileges that I know sensible people will respect.

Or, if there should be any hypercritics among THE TRUTH SEEKER subscribers ("God forbid."—Paul.) I can treat them as Christians manage their Jehovah—ask pardon for iniquities, and then open a new account. Selah.

MAUSTON, WIS.

A Christian prayed that their Lord would send a snow-storm to prevent my arrival. Knowing the uncertain state of the weather I took "time by the foretop," and by traveling all night, landed at the hospitable door of "Billy the Barber" at four o'clock in the morning of the day I was advertised to speak, having been stopped twice by the snow blockade. That Holy Willie's prayer must hav reached heaven behind time, for the next day, and the next, the snow came from heaven in fast falling flakes until the fences were covered and the railroad tracks buried, no trains running for days. As I had no other engagements definitly set I am staying here "preaching" to good audiences every night composed of many of the best citizens of Mauston.

Day before yesterday I attended the funeral service of an old citizen, over whose body the Rev. Mr. Brown fired a cowardly shot at Freethought. In the evening I took occasion in my own meeting to pay my respects to the reverend gentleman for his shockingly bad taste in attacking Infidelity at such a time.

The Liberals here, Messrs. Holgate, Sykes, Phillips, Goodrich, Adler, and others to the number of fifty or more, in the vicinity, hav kept the watch-fires burning this winter. As many as four hundred are interested now. This fact alone excites the ire of the godly.

Wm. Holgate is one of those outspoken men who use no concealment, no policy, little polish. He is the last kind of a person that the church devil would try to mold into a hypocrit. The pious people hate him with a godly hatred. They do not see underneath the rough-and-ready speech a warm and generous nature. They know him to be a despiser of shams; but his blunt speech leaves many of them no room to suspect that, in his vocabulary, sham and Christianity are not synonymous terms.

Christianity blurs the vision and warps the judgment of its victims, and leads its devotees to judge of character almost entirely by the exterior, hence it is continually blundering in its superficial estimates of the motivs and purposes of Infidels.

There is scarcely a town in this nation where Liberal and scientific lectures could not be held as easily as in Mauston, Wis. Last night (Sunday, March 13th), the fine Opera Hall was crowded to listen to my sixteenth lecture.

Chiefly to "Billy the Barber" is our success due, from the fact that he started the ball in motion. Now there are many that take hold with a will and are good, fearless workers, notably Mr. Sykes, Mr. Adler, Mr. Moore, Mr. Phillips. Just such an uncompromising talker is needed, in every village and city, as this jolly rotund Englishman, graduate of a coal mine.

Book Notice.

Progress and Poverty. By Henry George. One vol., 12mo., 512 pp. Price, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00; extra cloth, $1.50. Sold at this office.

Two generations ago the poet Shelley wrote:

"Men of England, wherefore plow
For the lord who lays you low?
Wherefore weave with toil and care
The rich robes your tyrants wear?
. . . . . .
The seed ye sow another reaps,
The wealth ye find another keeps,
The robes ye weave another wears,
The arms ye forge another bears."

For two lives there has been no answer to these questions of Shelley from the workmen of England. For three-quarters of a century the poor hav been growing poorer, the rich richer. But to a close observer there is this difference between 1800 and 1881: The deep thought of the age now turns not so much on political as on social questions—not so much on the government as on society. What was before "thought out" by the brains of philosophers in the student's closet is now being "felt out" by the hearts of the people alike in Paris or Russia, Berlin, London, and New York. Schemes for the reorganization of society are, in our day, no longer the dreams of theorists; they hav been taken from the closet of the student, and move vast bodies of men throughout Europe and in America.

Now comes this new work of Mr. George, full of ideas, full of information, and, in my opinion, the most important contribution to political economy or social science since Adam Smith published his "Wealth of Nations."

Why do misery and crime exist? Why does one nation export food of which its own members are in need, while another nation sends its manufactures throughout the world, although hundreds of thousands at home are scarcely clothed?

Believing that this new book on political economy is deserving of attention from thoughtful minds, like the subscribers of this paper, as an honest attempt of an honest and thoughtful man to solve this great question of poverty on scientific not theological grounds, I will endeavor to giv an abstract of this book, that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may hav some general idea of the importance of the book and its contents.

To the intelligence of those who will mainly read these lines I need not add anything more than already written to show the importance of the book.

The great question of civilization is, as Mr. George states it, "Why, in spite of increase in productiv power, do wages tend to a minimum which will giv but a bare living?" Now the answer of previous current writers on political economy is, "That wages are fixed by the ratio between the number of laborers and the amount of capital devoted to the employment of labor, and constantly tend to the lowest amount on which laborers will consent to liv and reproduce, because the increase of the number of laborers tends naturally to follow and overtake any increase in capital."

Mr. George, in "Progress and Poverty," refutes this, and endeavors to prove, among other things, first, "That wages, confining the statement to labor expended in production, instead of being drawn from capital, are in reality drawn from the product of the labor for which they are paid."

It would seem presumptuous for an unknown man to call in question what hav been fundamental doctrins in all schools of political economy from Adam Smith, Ricardo, Malthus, down to John Stuart Mill; but this unknown man shows himself to be a writer of original and strong mind. His education, we deem, must hav been in the "University of the World," under the particular care of Dame Nature. Perhaps his college was before the mast of some whale ship or in the bush of Australia or the mines of California. It might hav been all this, for we understand Mr. George hails from San Francisco.

After saying this much of the author, I will say his book will stand the criticism that Emerson is wont to apply to books of this kind—that "when any reformer has a scheme of reform, ask him if he has read Plato? If he has not, his plans are not worthy attention, for probably all his ideas, and all objections to them, hav forestalled them."

Mr. George has read Plato. He brings to his topic a mind equipped from libraries on social science—from the ancient Hindoo holy writings down to the last magazine essay on English politics. He knows what other theories of political science are and what arguments there are for their support.

All present writers admit that as progress goes on the accumulation of wealth increases, and labor thus becomes more productiv, which is undoubtedly true.

Comte's statement is that "The aggregate progress of mankind is constantly lessening the relativ importance of material wants."

Admitting, then, that civilization increases production, it would be therefore true that the more centralized a people are the more wealth per head they are able to produce. Facts and statistics bear out this theory. England can produce more than Russia. The half a million concentrated in a small state like Connecticut will produce more wealth than the same number scattered over a large state like Kansas.

Mr. George's principal statements, wherein he differs from other writers, are:

1. Wages are not drawn from capital, etc. (Before alluded to.)

2. The function of capital is to assist labor in production with tools, seed, etc., and with the wealth required to carry on exchanges.

3. Disproof of the Malthusian theory.

After giving facts and arguments which seem sufficient to maintain his points, the author asserts that "the cause, which, in spite of the enormous increase of productiv power, confines the great body of producers to the least share of the product upon which they will consent to liv is not the limitation of capital, nor yet the limitation of the powers of nature, which respond to labor. If not therefore found in the laws which bound the production of wealth, it must be sought for in the laws which govern the distribution of wealth."

Mr. George would abolish private ownership in land. This seems radical; but in reading at length "Progress and Poverty," we are bound to say that the author, in his methods, is conservativ. Unlike many radical reformers, Mr. George recognizes a legitimate claim of capital (not land) to be paid limited interest; but he shows that the vast amount of what is called capital, upon which dividends are paid, is really not capital, but fictitious capital, and is the result of monoply. Under the present system of land monopoly he sums up the law of interest: "The relation between wages and interest is determined by the average power of increase which attaches to capital from its use in reproductiv modes, and as rent raises interest will fall as wages fall. . . . Wages depend upon the margin of production, or upon the produce which labor can obtain at the highest point of natural productivness open to it without the payment of rent."

Continuing, Mr. George says: "This law of wages accords with and explains universal facts that without its apprehension seem unrelated and contradictory. It shows that where land is free and labor is unassisted by capital the whole produce will go to labor as wages. Where land is free and labor is assisted by capital, wages will consist of the whole produce, less that part necessary to induce the storing up of labor as capital. . . . Where land is subject to ownership, and where natural opportunities are monopolized, wages may be forced by the competition among laborers to the minimum at which the laborer can liv."

He holds that science, invention, machinery, art, under the present system, tend more to increase rent than to increase wages; "that with increase in productiv power, rent tends to even greater increase, thus producing a constant tendency to the forcing down of wages."

The author cites from an old Hindoo proverb, "Grants of land giv the owner white parasols and elephants mad with pride."

To illustrate the wisdom of this, Mr. George says: "Three things invite to production—labor, capital, and land. Three parties divide the produce—the laborer, the capitalist, and the land owner. If with an increase of production the laborer gets no more, and the capitalist no more, it is a necessary inference that the land owner reaps the whole gain. The increase of rent explains why wages and interest do not increase."

To illustrate how this theory is carried out by the facts of civilization, the author, on page 260 of his volume, makes the following statement: "The enormous increase in the efficiency of labor, which even in agriculture is estimated at seven or eight hundred per cent, and in many branches of industry is almost incalculable, has only added to rent. The rent of agricultural land in England is now, according to Professor Rogers, one hundred and twenty times as great, measured in money, as it was five hundred years ago, and fourteen times as great, measured in wheat, while the rent of building land and mineral land has been enormously greater. According to the estimate of Prof. Fawcett, the capitalized rental value of the land of England now amounts to £4,500,000, or $21,870,000,000 (a sum about a dozen times larger than the national debt of the United States); that is to say, a few thousand of the people of England hold a lien upon the labor of the rest, the capitalized value of which is more than twice as great as, at the average price of Southern negroes in 1860, would be the value of the whole population of England were they slaves."

The author occupies considerable space in showing the inefficiency of remedies currently advocated for the relief of poverty. Detailing at some length that neither greater economy in government or the better education of the working classes and improved habits of industry and thrift, or combination of workmen for the advance of wages, or co-operation of labor and capital, or from a more general distribution of land, would be a sufficient remedy, each and all others would be at most a mitigation, and not a cure. He asserts that the true remedy to extirpate poverty, to make wages what justice commands they should be—the full earnings of the laborer, is to substitute for individual ownership of land a common ownership—"We must make land common property."

Mr. George then endeavors to show the justice of the remedy, the injustice of private property in land, and what constitutes the rightful basis of property. In endeavoring to answer the question, Mr. George displays his conservatism, and also his depth of thought, which takes in the rights of all.

First, there is the primary right of a man to himself, to the use of his own power, to the emjoyment of the fruits of his own exertions.

Mr. George does not include in the term "land" property that has been put on land, as houses, machinery, stock, or any of those things that embody labor and are brought into existence by human exertion. "The essential character of land, and those things that should be common to all, is that they do not embody labor and exist independent of human exertion and irrespectiv of man. . . . The value of land is the price of monopoly."

Originally there is no ownership in the land itself except seizure and the right of the conqueror.

The whole earth is for the benefit of mankind, not any man or any class, and the elements belong equally to every child born into the world "for this reason, that which a man actually makes or produces is his own, as against all the world, to enjoy or destroy, to use, to exchange, or to giv. To every thing produced by human exertion there is therefore a clear and indisputable title to exclusiv possession and enjoyment, which is perfectly consistent with justice, as it descends from the original producer, in whom it is vested by natural law. Now there can be to the ownership of anything no rightful title which is not derived from the title of the producer and the right of ownership that springs from labor, because it excludes the possibility of any other ownership. If the man is entitled to the produce of his labor, then no man can be rightfully entitled to the ownership of anything that is not the produce of his labor, or the labor of some one else, from whom the right has passed to him. If production givs to the producer the right to exclusiv possession and enjoyment, there can rightfully be no exclusiv possession and enjoyment of anything not the production of labor, and the recognition of private property in land is wrong. . . Where now producers can claim as rent a portion of the wealth created by producers, the right of the producer to the fruits of labor is to that extent denied."

If the crowded columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER would allow, I would gladly occupy more space to bring this book of Mr. George's to a patient and respectful consideration. I trust that I hav in a measure attained my object to hav some of the thoughts of this book brought to the serious attention of those who love their fellow-men, and also to stimulate thought on the subject of poverty and progress. All who look forward to the time when the words "always with you" shall hav no meaning should not fail to read this book. EDWARD W. SEARING.

New York, March, 1881.

Notes.

Recently when I was in Kalamazoo, Union City, Dowagiac, and other important towns along the line of the Michigan Central Railroad, and was presenting the claims of the New York TRUTH SEEKER before the officials of this prominent railroad line of the West, and also among the bankers and the legal and medical fraternities of those places, I was occasionally met with the inquiry, "Are you the proprietor of this paper, and is your name D. M. Bennett?" In replying in the negativ a blush of modesty must hav come over me when I found myself mistaken for one of the ablest and most elaborate of the Radical writers of the age.

But I was pleased and almost proud in the successful performance of an humble service in obtaining subscribers quite extensivly for such a strong and Radical journal as THE TRUTH SEEKER among these classes of the clearest heads and the most practical minds in the state of Michigan.

I hav obtained patronage for THE TRUTH SEEKER among all classes. My efforts hav not been confined to the professional classes, or to any one class.

A large proportion of my patronage has come from the various departments among the mechanics. The intelligent and reading men and women in the departments of mechanics are perhaps as Liberal as any class.

During the winter months, while the roads hav been more or less blockaded with snow, I hav not ventured out in the country much among the farmers; but so far as I hav been among this class I hav met with a cheerful encouragement and a very liberal patronage.

Nothing has afforded me a greater pleasure than the consciousness of being able to place a reformatory and philosophical paper before a class of intelligent and appreciativ people who are limited in financial means and who might otherwise hav been left to a meager supply of weak and unsatisfactory moral and intellectual food from the various sensational and sectarian publications of the times.

Respectfully, C. S. ROWLEY.

For Books Received.

While in London last autumn we received such marked kindnesses from the Secular Society of that city that we could not do less than send for their library an assortment of our publications. We are very much gratified with the receipt of the following letters, by which it appears the books hav been received and are appreciated:

CENTRAL LONDON BRANCH

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

HALL OF SCIENCE CLUB AND INSTITUTE,

OLD STREET, LONDON, E. C., March 19, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I hav much pleasure in forwarding the best thanks of the Committee of the above for your handsome donation to our library. In acknowledging them I need hardly say that they are eagerly sought after and read. The applicants for them are so numerous that it will be some time yet for all to read them. I remain, dear sir,

Your truly, J. T. RAMSEY, Librarian.

HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON, ENG., March 19, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: The books you wrote me about hav arrived and are now in the library here. I hav no doubt they will be highly appreciated by the members of the Society for whom they were sent.

I hope your visit to Europe was an enjoyable one. When I visit America, which I intend to do soon, I shall hav much pleasure in renewing our acquaintance.

Yours truly, R. O. SMITH.

The following is from the National Reformer, London, with reference to an assortment of our publications sent to the London Freethought Publishing Company:

Mrs. E. D. Slenker is well known in America as a writer of stories of a thoroughly Freethought character. In our American parcel we find a pleasant tale from her pen in which are related the fortunes of various families, Christian and Freethinking, one of the latter giving the title to the book. The Darwins are thoughtful, earnest people, who on their arrival in a country village are regarded by many as "unvisitable" because of their heresy, and who act as a center of social happiness in their new sphere. A Christian deacon is the black sheep of the story, and the tale is written with grace and vigor.

Another work from the pen of the same lady is "John's Way," a brightly told radical story. Our readers will find Mrs. Slenker a pleasant acquaintance.

"Nathaniel Vaughan; Priest and Man" is a book of more pretension. The heroin is a charming little eight-year-old child, imaginativ and sensitiv, who falls a victim to the overzealous and morbid religion of the priest. Miss Macdonald writes with considerable power, and her descriptions of the child's ways and thoughts are delicately executed; particularly good are the almost last scenes of little Winifred's life, when she is sickening with brain fever.

Mr. Underwood is well known as a most cultivated writer and speaker from the Freethought platform. The debates in which he has taken part hav caused much interest in the United States, and his pamphlets hav a wide circulation. We need only draw attention to the various works from his pen which will be found mentioned in our advertising columns.

The following is from the London Secular Review:

We owe Mr. D. M. Bennett, of New York TRUTH SEEKER, an apology for omitting to notice his handsomely-bound volume, "An Infidel Abroad," received three weeks ago. The work consists of a reprint of the letters Mr. Bennett contributed to his own journal during his recent tour in Europe, and also a fine portrait of the author. The information given in the book is most varied and interesting, and the work is written in an easy and familiar style. In Mr. Bennett's volume of letters the reader will find much to reward him for its perusal.

Letters from Friends.

MARLEY, ILL., March 29, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: As soon as you decide about your trip round the world please giv notice in your paper, and I will forward the money for my paper, the book "An Infidel Abroad," and $5 for the trip.

Yours truly, FRANK SEARLES.

PIPE STONE, MINN, Feb. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for $5 for your trip round the world, and it will be ready when I see a hint in THE TRUTH SEEKER of your being ready for the same.

Yours with respect, A. D. FERRIS.

CORVALLIS, OR., March 25, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I also hav a "V" waiting for the round-the-world trip.

Believe me ever your servant, B. F. HYLAND.

PARK CITY, UTAH, March 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you $5 when you get ready to start round the world. Hoping you will receive funds enough for your proposed trip, I remain,

Your friend and well-wisher, JAS. G. WATSON.

OSSEO, MINN., March 15, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: You can count on me for $5 for your travels round the planet whenever you are ready to go. Yours, CHRIST. SCHREIBER.

STANTON, IOWA, March 19, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Put me down for $5 for your trip round the world. O. E. ERICKSON.

FLORENCE, WIS., March 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put down my name and H. Hunter's for $5 each for the trip round the world, subject to call. My wife takes pleasure in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. She sends her best respects to Mrs. Bennett.

E. O. MARSH

OTTUMWA, IOWA, April 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I pledge my name for $5.00 if you go round the world. THOMAS HARDESTY.

VOSBURG, KAN., March 30, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER weekly and consider it a capital paper. Hope you will get to make that trip round the world. As far as my means will allow I shall stand by you.

Your truly, I. B. WERNER.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., March 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Will send subscription soon. Call on me for $5.00 when you get ready to go round the world. HENRY DONNEL.

SHERMAN, DA., Feb. 22, 2881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You can count on me for $5.00 to help pay on the trip around the world. Your letters from Europe are worth the price of the paper for one year. Yours truly, THEO. ANDREWS.

OTTAWA, KAN., March 29, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Call on me for $5 to help you round the world if you will go. SALEM FOUTS, Sen.

ATLANTA, GA., March 27, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: You may put me down as one of the number to contribute $5 toward your trip around the world upon your terms. Notify me when to remit. Yours, GEO. DISBROW.

BUSHNELL, ILL., March 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: If you take your trip around the world you can count on me for $5.

Yours, DWIGHT WARREN.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 2, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: You may count me in for $5 on the round-the-world trip. Yours truly,

F. C. JACKSON.

CANYON FERRY, MONTANA, March 21, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: When you decide to take your trip around the world I shall send you $5. Hope you will go, I do like you so much for your honesty, and I like your wife too, the dear woman.

Yours respectfully, MRS. J. V. STAFFORD.

GIRARD, KAN., March 29, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You can put me down for $5 for your trip round the world. My wife wants your book. By reading your letters it seems to her that she has seen everything herself.

Your friend, WM. SIMPSON.

TELLAMIRAH, O., March 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for a "V" for your circular trip, and if you pass near the Dead Sea bring me a lock of hair from the head of Lot's wife. The money is ready whenever called for.

Very respectfully your friend, J. J. MCCOY.

AURORA, ILL., April 3, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: If you will and must go around the world, put me down for a "V," as I would not miss the work for $25, yet would rather giv more than half the sum to hav you remain at home. I fully indorse the sentiments of Mrs. Grace L. Parkhurst. She takes a sensible, business view of this matter. Respectfully yours, R. R. HALL, M.D.

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just been reading in the last TRUTH SEEKER letters pro and con in regard to your proposed trip around the world. Some of them seem to think it will be too hard for you. I think such do not know very well the work and number or hours you devote to business. If they did they would consider it a relief for you to go. As much as I would like to hav you here, I am in favor of your going. Please put me down for a "V," and, if necessary, an "X."

If you should make the trip, I hope you will visit the so-called holy land, and, while there, look up some of those ancient wheat fields. I am quite interested to know the size of them, as no doubt some of them are very large. My reason for thinking them so is from the Bible account of God's slaying 50,070 reapers because one of them had a little Yankee curiosity and lifted the lid of that old shittim-wood box to see what was in it. We can't hav any such large wheat fields in Minnesota or California.

Fraternally yours, A. H. FRANK.

WILSONVILLE, KY., April 2, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please set me down for your travels around God's football, and if I am on the surface of said ball I'll try and raise the everlasting "V," and try to induce many of my friends to do the same if possible.

I hav just been reading Bishop Marvin's travels (a Methodist bishop), and I think he told all the good he could of his own religion and as little of that of others as an honest man could without being detected. Now I want to hear the voice of reason from the oriental countries. I want to hear the voice of one who is not interested in perverting the truth for the benefit of any particular form of religion. I feel particularly interested in the land of gods.

Hoping that your efforts may meet with success, and that you may soon be on your journey, I remain

Yours for freedom and truth, SAMUEL B. CLARK.

DANVILLE, ILL., March 31, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: If there was another D. M. Bennett to take your place in the office I would say, Pack your shirts, etc., and get off on the trip around the world as soon as possible, for procrastination is dangerous after a man arrives at your age. As it is, I hav no choice in the matter. However, if you decide to go, draw on me for my share of funds to assist in paying the expense. Yours,

C. R. DWIGHT.

CROSSWICKS, N. J., April 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I hand you ten dollars to help repair Thomas Paine's monument at New Rochelle.

I fear the subscriptions of five dollars each for the trip around the world are coming in too slow to enable you to start in due time. I presume many are poor and not able to spare the money. But are there not among the Liberals many who can spare more than $5 for this enterprise when they take into consideration that they get in return two or three interesting volumes for the money?

I hav a proposition to make. I will be one of twenty-five to giv $25 apiece. I will at any rate most cheerfully add $10 to the $10 already pledged. I think those who are able to respond in this way and will do so will not begrudge to aid our friend Bennett to accomplish that proposed long and useful journey. Liberals should remember that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. I sincerely hope there will be one hundred who will respond to the proposition I hav made, and that by the middle of May. Very truly thine in the cause of freedom to only do the right, CAROLINE S. ELLIS.

[REPLY.—Many thanks to our kind friend for the interest she manifests and the generosity she evinces. It is enough to make one proud to hav such friends. Would that the Liberal ranks were fuller of persons with the ability to aid in public enterprises which she evidently possesses. If the funds are furnished to make that long journey we will wish to leave in July, spend a few weeks in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, parts of England we did not see, with perhaps a visit to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and possibly Spain, and then attend the Freethinkers' International Congress at Paris, in September, after which start for Greece, Turkey, Egypt, Palestine, India, Burmah, China, Japan, etc., spending the winter in those warm countries.—ED. T. S.]

NORWICH, CONN., March 25, 1881.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: I hav been for a long time wanting to write and ask you to count me in on the proposed expedition around the world. Of course we shall all want to make the trip with you in a mental capacity by reading your graphic description of the journey. Certainly five dollars is cheap enough for the ticket.

I am again on the war-path; this time the foe is doctorcraft, the paramour of priestcraft, that Woman of Babylon, from whose toils we are struggling to escape.

The inclosed article from Cooley's Weekly, the paper that published my "Independence" articles on the outrage perpetrated on you, will explain.

I hav induced the editor to giv me a hearing, and now that I hav got into position I propose in my next to pour some pretty hot shot into their medical monopoly barricade.

It is strange that these so-styled professions cannot do business on the square, relying on their own merit, without special legislation to force their vile nóstrums upon the people.

Perhaps you may not agree with my ideas regarding medical matters; but am certain you cannot approve of these attempts of the craft to trample on our medical rights.

Will send you the next if our editor has the nerve to publish it.

I hav not yet got through with the other "craft." You may hear hear from me, by and by, concerning our old foe, priestcraft. I think it well to get such radical articles as we can into semi-independent papers, since they reach many who are not favored with our favorit outspoken TRUTH SEEKER.

Truly, BYRON BOARDMAN.

NETTLETON, MO., March 16, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I cannot longer overlook the fact that I owe the TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed please find $3.50, for which giv me credit. After reading "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," I cannot see how the Christian world made anything by sending you to the penitentiary. I think it will take about 10,000,000 sermons to undo what that work has done. Put me down a "V" for your trip round the world. If you come home by the way of San Francisco, why cannot you stop in northwest Missouri and giv us a lecture, say at Kansas City or St. Joseph? Nothing would suit the Liberals of the West better. Hoping you will soon start on your trip, I remain Yours, W. H. SLOANE.

[We see nothing to prevent our stopping to talk to our friends in a few places as we cross the continent.—ED. T. S.]

FORT MCKINNIE, WY. T., April 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You may count me in for $5 on your trip round the world. When you decide to go giv as timely warning as possible because THE TRUTH SEEKER is at times thirty days after date reaching this place.

I hope there is a pleasant journey round the world and many happy days in store for you. I should like to giv you the right hand of friendship and a hearty welcome on your journev, and to take Anthony by the throat with my left.

Yours in truth and friendship, ANDREW BROWN.

CINCINNATI, O., April 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for $5 to aid in the trip around the world.

If it is not too much trouble for you, bring that hill along or a part of it where Lucifer picked his nephew up and from which he showed him the world. Yours forever, CARL PASSCAL.

[We fear this request is rather more than we can accomplish. A hill or mountain high enough to enable one to see the countries on the opposit side of the globe would be extremely hard to find, and, if found, would be heavy to carry. We might bring a pocketful.—ED. T. S.]

BROOKLYN, April 2, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed find $5, a subscription toward the repairing of Paine's monument. We will giv $50 toward erecting a monument in Central Park to the memory of Thomas Paine.

MR. and MRS. J. H. B.

COVINGTON, IND., April 2, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find $3 to apply on fixing the monument to the glorious Thomas Paine to be accredited as follows, Bart W. Graham, $1; James Napier, $1; Schuyler LaTourrette, $1. The friend Jas. Napier is eighty years old. Respectfully yours,

SCHUYLER LATOURRETTE.

P. S.—Since I got my order I met a friend of Paine who wishes to be known to the amount of $1, which I inclose, and credit to Geo. Dunkerly. S. LAT.

HINSDALE, N. H., April 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: There are many things I desire to do but which in the busy cares of life are allowed to pass and go undone. But your article in this week's TRUTH SEEKER reminds me to act at once, and I do so by inclosing $1.00 for the fund to repair Paine's monument. And to your suggestion that 1,000 persons giv $5.00 each toward a new monument to Paine's memory to be erected in New York city, let me say I will giv $5.00 gladly, and double it if need be. In so good a cause cannot some movement be inaugurated by press or people to induce the new Postmaster-General to, by one bold but needed act, relieve the mail service of the shame and disgrace of being controled—in a great measure—by such a villain as Anthony Comstock?

Respectfully, HENRY E. HUNTER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Feb. 3, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: You say about your trip around the world that you want all the pros and cons. My faculties of foresight and apprehension are sharp and activ and so my opinions may not hav much weight with you and your hopeful readers. After much thought upon the subject I can say that I want you to go much, but would be better pleased to hav you stay and work where you are. I will giv some of my reasons briefly.

I do not think your short, safe, and successful travels in Europe are a safe criterion. You are too old, and the change of climate and irregularities of life and physical conditions to which you will be subject, as well as the constant action and strain of your brain and nervous system, will place your health and life in constant jeopardy. It is also possible that you might be in danger from sneaking enemies in human form.

It is a big, hazardous job to go where and do what you propose to do, and quite different from going round the world as most do, for pleasure on a common route, without much risk, exposure, or brain-work. You need far more time, money, and personal and physical protection than you can get, hav, or command. However desirable the results of such a project, it looks to me to be premature to undertake it now. In due time there will be more than an "Infidel around the world," each clime and nation to survey, for the sake of truth humanity. If none of these considerations are of any weight just let them rest on the short arm of the lever, or as ballast, or contingencies. "All partial evil universal good," but I would rather Bro. Bennett would stay at home, when he is so much needed, than to run the risk of losing him forever.

Yours for the best, J. H. Cook.

Mauston, Wis., April 1, 1881.

Mr. D. M. Bennett: W. F. Jamieson aroused great interest in Liberalism by the delivery of three courses of lectures in our town. This enraged the ministers of the "most high" to such a degree that at the funeral of a Liberal-minded citizen the officiating clergyman exultingly declared that the deceased did not die an unbeliever. Mr. Jamieson was present at the funeral and in the evening, at the close of his lecture, paid his respects to the reverend gentlemen as follows:

"A circumstance occurred to-day that ought not to be allowed to pass. If it was right for one of your clergy at a funeral to attack Freethought it is surely right for me to take notice of his allegations. For my own part I never would attack the belief of another where that other could not hav a chance to reply. I would not hav the shockingly bad taste to make an assault upon even Christianity over the dead body of any citizen. Any person that would do such a thing seem to me to be deficient n common sense.

"If a man dies a believer in Christianity that is no proof that Christianity is true any more than a man dying an Infidel is proof of the truth of Infidelity. The truth of a doctrin is not proved in that way. Why, then, should Christians illogically lay stress on it as a proof that Christianity is true? They do not allow dying testimony as any proof about anything else. But if such Christian tricks as were resorted to to-day in the Methodist pulpit will aid Christianity it is welcome to its advantage. Truth needs no such supports. None but bigots could sanction cowardly blows, even when they are given in the name of religion.

"I hav a sincere admiration for the man who has moral courage to maintain and defend his honest convictions; but that man who, in the name of Christianity, on the solemn occasion of the funeral of a respected and Liberal-minded citizen, knowing that a large number of Freethinkers were in the congregation, goes out of his way, under the wretched excuse that he was requested to do so, and undertakes to make capital for Christianity as against Infidelity, I detest. But the reverend gentleman strained a point to strike at Infidelity.

"If all he said of Mr. Beckwith's belief is true, it is nothing against Freethought. But a number of citizens who were intimately acquainted with Mr. Beckwith do not hesitate to say that the Methodist preacher's representation about his belief in his last days are not true.

"Our deceased friend told his own brother-in-law hundreds of times that he did not believe in the Bible as the word of God.

"Why should Rev. Mr. Brown take a funeral occasion to stab Freethought? Even prize-fighters hav too much honor to strike an enemy below the belt. But a Brown bigot gets behind a wooden coward's castle—perhaps I ought to say a coward's wooden castle: take your choice—to thrust at Infidelity over the remains of an honored citizen.

"Rev. Mr. Brown says that Mr. Beckwith attended my first course of lectures on Freethought delivered in this place—attended all of them. This statement he interjected in his funeral discourse to-day. Mrs. Beckwith, his excellent lady, who is no doubt a firm believer in the Baptist faith, heard some of the lectures, perhaps all, and remarked to her husband on their way home at the close of the last lecture 'My faith in the Christian religion is stronger than ever.' I do not doubt that the lady said this, because she is a stanch member of the Baptist church. I am not at all surprised that church-members should attend five of my lectures and still remain Christians. I do not expect to convert every Christian that listens to me, especially in five lessons.

"I am not seeking, as I hav already said, to convert people to my way of thinking, but to induce them to do their own thinking. If five sermons could convert Infidels to Christian preaching, America ought to hav no Freethinkers in it.

"But if my Freethought lectures hav the effect to make the faith of Christian stronger, then why should they so savagely attack Infidelity? Why should they entreat each other not to listen to my heresies? Would it not be a good idea for Christians to send me out as a missionary to strengthen the faith of Christians? We were solemnly told in the discourse to-day that Mr. Beckwith agreed with his wife in saying that my lectures increased his faith in Christianity. I am really, according to this, doing more for Christianity than Rev. Mr. Brown, for he is injuring it, while I am helping it.

"There is another side to this story. The bereaved widow's brother told me this afternoon, since the sermon, that at the first course he asked Mr. Beckwith how he liked my lectures. Mr. Beckwith's answer was, 'Dow, I like him well; you ought to hear that man; it is just what I believe, too, only I believe in the future.'

"The Methodist parson to-day represented that our dead friend took no interest in Infidelity after my first course, whereas he urged people to attend this second course. He had the tickets in his pocket when he died. This fact exposes Rev. Mr. Brown. Doubtless our deceased friend acquiesced in the wishes of his wife about the funeral exercises, and the old hymns and tunes selected by his request to be sung do not prove that he was less friendly to Liberalism than he had been.

"If Mr. Brown was anxious to tell 'all,' as he said, why did he not mention the fact of the Baptist quarrel, and that was the real reason why the ceremonies were held in the Methodist church, for his wife's cousin said last Saturday that he declared, 'If I die I want you to remember one thing, that I die with curses on my lips against certain persons in this town.' But the Rev. Mr. Brown says he died a full believer in the Lord Jesus Christ."

We hav kindly offered any clergyman one-half the time to rebut anything we say. The manly course would hav been for him to come here before these audiences and confront us. But it is the old story—the priest spoils the man. I pity him for his cowardice. Christianity and not the man is to blame.

The death of our fellow-citizen occurred on the 7th inst., and the funeral took place on the 10th. Being a Free Mason, his brother Masons buried him after the Rev. Mr. Brown got through with his blarney of claiming a Liberal-minded man for a Christian.

Yours truly, Wm. H. Holgate.

Lake Mills, Iowa, April 1, 1881.

Mr. Bennett: Please find inclosed a $5 postal order for my subscription to The Truth Seeker—$3 for the paper, and $1 donation for you as yearly tax for the support of the ministry of Freethought. It is my desire that every man that is freed from the past and present creeds of all religions should donate to you $1 each year for the further encouragement of the cause that you so boldly advocate. As for the round trip, if you should make it you can count me as one subscriber to the trip around the world by one of the noblest Infidels that ever made the same, but if I were to hav my choice in your labor, I should prefer that you stay at home and labor where you would enjoy all the comforts of life as time rolls on, and hav the pleasure and comforts of a home in time of need. For the other dollar you may send me some lectures of Mr. Chainey and the bold hero, Bob Ingersoll, as he is called out here. Yours truly, S. D. Wadsworth.

Lebanon, O., March 22, 1881.

Mr. Bennett: I hav no $5.00 to send you out of the country and perhaps out of existence.

Yours truly, D. M. Worley.

McGinles Station, O., March 28, 1881.

Mr. Editor: Please send me The Truth Seeker for the inclosed. I am hungry, I am thirsty; I think The Truth Seeker will fill the void.

Very truly yours, John G. Agnew.

McHenry, Ill., March 28, 1881.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $3 for The Truth Seeker. Although Spiritualism has been a demonstrated fact for many years to me, I hope that none of our Materialistic friends will object to my having the benefit of your paper if I pay for it promptly. I like the suggestion of Grace L. Parkhurst. Let Liberals do all they can, as your needs require, to sustain you at home. You are needed here.

Fraternally yours. Geo. Gage.

Keene, Mich.

Friend Bennett: I saw a short article in your paper concerning the loaning of The Truth Seeker to those who do not subscribe for it; and now let me say a few words in regard to the matter. I am the only one in this part of the township that takes your paper. I am surrounded by so-called Christians, but I manage to hav the paper read by a half dozen different families, and I can assure you that it is having an effect in the right direction. Only last week a regular ranting Methodist requested the loan of my paper, and you may be assured that I didn't refuse him, and I think that the best policy is to loan them to all or as many as possible, and in the end it will hav the effect of obtaining subscribers. I do know that ignorance and superstition cannot remain in the same house with The Truth Seeker. The Christians hav called me hard names, but I giv them large doses of pure unadulterated Infidelity without sugar-coating it. I also quote unsparingly from that book of sacred nastiness, and I expect to liv to see them as much ashamed of the old book as I am. I am well satisfied that if The Truth Seeker could be read by all the people for one year the reverends would hav to go to digging potatoes or stealing for a living, and the sooner that time comes the better it will be for all concerned. Wishing you all the happiness that ought to fall to the lot of an Infidel, I remain

Yours, C. L. Frost.

Union, Utah, March 20, 1881.

Mr. D. M. Bennett: You are certainly as bold in your attacks against Christianity as any man that ever attempted it. I hav read with interest some of your publications, and I, for one, feel disposed to advocate free thought and free speech. Several years ago I requested some of the Mormon authorities to excommunicate me from the deluding system of Mormonism, which they did, and turned me over to the buffetings of Satan, which is customary for them to do with those who are not disposed to be their dupes. Some of my neighbors chose to style me an Infidel for interesting myself so much in the Liberal publications which are now afloat. Of course, the most of these are published by D. M. Bennett, who is regarded by the Mormons as being a co-worker with the great dragon, or perhaps he may be the devil himself who is to be let loose in the last days to torment the saints for a short season.

The Mormons look for the son of man to come soon. Lucifer must then be made fast again. Then the millennium begins. The Mormons can see signs of the near approach of the millennium every day. Some of them set the time at 1885, others at 1891, for the meek and lowly Jesus to descend from heaven to stay a thousand years on earth below. If he should happen to delay his coming the Mormons will be under the necessity of conjuring up some kind of a theological absurdity to blind their humble followers still longer.

Those of the Mormons who enter into polygamy and continue to pay tithes yearly—the tenth of all their increase—and obey councils are to be something more than angels in the next world; they are to be gods (as the angels are neither married nor given in marriage); each of them is to hav the privilege of creating for himself a world after the pattern of the one he inhabits here; he is to take his two wives, or more, on to his new created world, and there begin to people it. Of course, he must hav a garden, in it a forbidden tree, a Satan to tempt one of his wives, or all of them, who must tempt him. They must eat, and then be cursed by a greater God, whom he is to acknowledge greater than himself. He must hav a Jesus Christ to be crucified, to restore them back again with all their posterity, who are to be worthy in his sight. He is to be both God and man, though he must not forget to keep in mind a God who is greater than himself. What a glorious opportunity for astronomers to make new discoveries when the Mormons get to creating new worlds! A. A. Tanner.

Hamilton, N. Y., March 17, 1881.

Mr. Editor: For some time past I hav been deeply interested in your paper, and do herewith offer you many thanks for the manner in which you tackle the religious class. Honestly speaking, they are a class that need all the sense you can scrape up for them, especially the Catholics. You will find nine out of every ten are on hand ready to swallow all that the priests hav a mind to choke down them, and for my part I don't think it is any use for the priests to waste their wind warning their fellow-cannibals not to attend Col. Ingersoll's lectures in case he may enlighten them. A pig may fly in time, but it is altogether very unlikely. No doubt it would be a very rare thing to hear tell of an Irish-Catholic Freethinker. No man who has any brains worth speaking of will believe in one-tenth part of the book called the Bible. The brains of a Catholic don't amount to a row of pins in regard to seeing through natured works. From an old Freethinker,

George Gardner.

Lansing, Mich., Feb. 28, 1881.

Mr Editor: A few days since, a Liberal-minded old gentleman of this town was presented by some of his orthodox friends with a handsomely-bound copy of the holy scriptures for family use, with a view to his conversion from Infidelity and the paths of error to the old superstitious faith of his ancestors. He accepted the gift, but in spirit rebelled against the designs of the donors, and straightway sought his book-binder, and with him laid a plot to frustrate the little scheme by labeling it in large type "Holy Absurdites," remarking that it was the best definition of its contents he could think of. Then he went on his way rejoicing, the same old inflexible Liberal. Thus does the progressiv spirit of the age move on.

For two weeks past two revivals hav been going on in Lainsburg, Mich., both night and day, and still the sinners hold out. Not a ghost of a convert has come forward, not a heart softened nor a tear shed, to reward the indefatigable labors and entreaties of the man of the pulpit. A. E. Nugent.

The Boundless Wisdom of God.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

'Tis said the great eternal God,
Whose power and wisdom shines abroad;
His wisdom is so deep and great,
He could no faulty thing create.

A God of wisdom, yet the man
He made upon his wisest plan
To ruins fell when brought to test,
When by the first temptation pressed.

His wisdom made a devil who
His grand designs soon overthrew;
Of boundless wisdom, yet his aim
Was balked by a vile serpent's game.

A wise God, yet his work all failed
When by the devil 'twas assailed;
His masterpiece was made in vain,
So he was forced to try again.

He sought to mend it by a flood,
And so he saved the pure and good,
But still it did no difference make
So long as Satan kept awake.

So his mistakes he'll burn up soon,
Take saints up in a big balloon;
An earth and heaven will start anew,
And maybe giv the devil his due.

If Satan still retains his wits,
This heaven he'll likely knock to bits.
'Tis hoped that God to stay this evil,
Will try some way to beat the devil.

This mighty God with boundless power
Retreats when wolves the lambs devour;
A God of strength, we see him foiled,
His every plan and purpose spoiled.

In him who can depend upon,
To save them from the evil one,
When he yields all to Satan's care,
And lets him triumph everywhere?

Day and Night.

"The mind is form and doth the body make."—Spenser.

"A new command I giv unto you, that you love one another." —Christ.

"The mind is its own place, and can make A hell of heaven, a heaven of hell." —Milton.

"Love is that pilot, o'er the waters dark,
Who looks on tempests, and is never shaken.
Love is that star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although its hight be taken;
If this be falsehood, and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved." —Shakspere.

Said a smile to a tear,
"Ever with you, my dear,"
Said a tear to a smile
"I'm with you all the while;"
And which is day and which night,
Be sure you solve this problem right.
—Bradley.

DAY.

The nightingale sleeps by the fountain,
The day star is waiting for day,
I heed not the light on the mountain,
I weep for my lover away;
Is he dreaming of me o'er the billow?
Is he waking to dream of his star.
Farewell, thou'rt too lonely, my pillow,
I fly to my lover afar.

NIGHT.

Come to my grave, my Mary dear,
Oh come! for I must go;
Come to my grave, and drop one tear,
I'll feel it there below,
And rising from my lowly berth,
I'll soar where angels are,
In every star that shines on earth,
To find my Mary there.

Death of Rosamond.

BY J. K. P. BAKER.

When fierce Albion, in his wars,
Arrayed the Lombards and Avars,
The Gepsidæ opposed in vain,
And Cunimund, their king, was slain.
Fair Rosamond, the brightest gem
In Cunimund's bright diadem,
Her royal sire and kindred dead,
A captiv wife Albion wed.
Her constant grief he could not brook,
And so the monarch's skull he took—
Her father's skull, oh, sad distress!
And made her drink to his success.
'Twas thus she drank and thirsted more,
But thirsted for Albion's gore.
'Twas thus she drank till this desire
Ran through her heart like liquid fire.
Helmichis heard her anguished sigh
And caught the lightning from her eye;
The spark his sympathies had fired
His love and wrath, so they conspired,
The husband, tyrant, monster killed,
Again the ghostly cup they filled,
And from the gory ghastly bowl
They drank damnation to his soul.
To gain protection from their deed
Longinus's court they sought with speed.
Longinus heard the tragic tale
And felt strange sympathy prevail;
From day to day his interest grew
Until he knew not what to do;
He thought of Justin and his wife,
Tiberius and his happy life;
And then he thought, unhappy elf,
Of Rosamond, and then himself.
The exarch sought her private ear,
Once more her wond'rous tale to hear;
But ere the tale was half way done
He offered her his heart and throne.
Helmichis's speedy death was planned—
Poison, and by his mistress's hand.
'Tis said that walls sometimes hav ears
For secrets that no human hears,
And also echoing lips to tell
Vows that are registered in hell.
So when she brought the ghastly skull
With liquid poison poured it full
And offered Helmichis to drink,
He stood awhile as if to think,
Then pressed it to her ruby lip
Alternate with himself to sip;
In vain she begged to be excused;
Her lover only seemed amused;
In vain the truth at last confessed,
"To die with thee is to be blessed;"
And so at length of fears beguiled
She took the cup and drank and smiled,
And thus they laughed and quaffed and died.
Longinus found them side by side,
Each in the other's close embrace,
A smile still lingering on each face;
A jealous frown than hell more dark
O'erspread the brow of the exarch.

THE LITTLE GIANT

POCKET SCALES.

The Greatest Invention of the Age. Something for Everybody.

A new invention of rare merit, which must not be classed with the cheap, miserable affairs that are now flooding the country. "THE LITTLE GIANT POCKET SCALE" is a neat and useful article, which, in time, will throw all the old fogy scales and balances into the shade. They weigh ACCURATELY from one ounce to eight pounds. Carefully built and constructed by skilful workmen, they will giv the best satisfaction wherever introduced. For beauty and workmanship they take the lead. Heavily plated with nickel silver, they cannot tarnish or rust. These scales are so small and portable that they can be easily carried in the vest pocket, and occupies no more space than a small pocket-knife. These scales are durable, strong, and accurate, and, with ordinary usage, will last a lifetime without getting out of order, as they are built upon an entirely new principle, which the inventor spent nearly two years in perfecting. They are pronounced by Ned Buntline (E. Z. C. Judson) and other leading American sportsmen to be superior to any scale heretofore imported from Europe, and they should be seen to be appreciated. Just the thing for Sportsmen, Trappers, Hunters, Agents, Travelers, and Family use; in fact "Something for Everybody." No dealer in the world can giv you a scale equal to the "LITTLE GIANT" for five times the price asked. The pattern is neatly constructed and finely finished. Every scale we send out is in perfect order, and is warranted so or money refunded every time. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case. These SCALES are no "CATCHPENNY" affair, but something both good and useful to every person in the Land.

AGENTS WANTED

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable! DOCTOR FELLOWS You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING

IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.

Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.

Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.

Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.

Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection toall classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.

NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apopicxy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 543 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH.

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manniug, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and huudreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standiug. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

WE only seem to hav the faculty we do not use. There is no long, healthy sleep to the mind and the moral will any more than to the body; but the alternativ is, liv or die.—O. Stearns.

TIME is the great innovator, and if time of course alter all things to the worse, and wisdom and counsel shall not alter them to the better, what shall be the end?—Bacon's Essays.

MEN hav a great deal to learn before they shall unlearn the lesson of intolerance—that fearful lesson too easily learned which suffocates the mind and intercepts other good lessons which the intelligent mind should receive.—O. B. Frothingham.

THE word skeptic implies to the average church-member the idea of a monster of wickedness, destitute of all moral restraint, capable of committing any crime in the calendar, and who always recants his opinions upon his death-bed.—Case Against the Church.

A VOTARY of wealth, when his brain givs way under disease or age, fancies he is a beggar. A Methodist, when his brain givs way under the some influences, fancies that he is forsaken of God. In both cases, the root of the matter is physical.—Goldwin Smith's Cowper.

MAY we not without hesitation affirm that a sincere recognition of the truth that our own and all other existence is a mystery absolutely and forever beyond our comprehension contains more of true religion than all the dogmatic theology ever written?—Herbert Spencer.

THE first step toward knowledge is to hav clear and distinct ideas, which I hav just reason every day more and more to think few men ever hav or think themselvs to want, which is one great cause of that infinit jargon and nonsense which so pesters the world.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

THE law is, in my opinion, one of the first and noblest of human sciences; a science which does more to quicken and invigorate the understanding than all the other kinds of learning put together; but it is not apt, unless in persons very happily born, to open and liberalize the mind exactly in the same proportion.—Burke.

HE that follows truth impartially seldom pleases any set of men; and I know not how a great many of those who pretend to be spreaders of light and teachers of truth would yet hav men depend upon them for it and take it rather from their words than their own knowledge, just cooked and seasoned as they think fit.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

NOTHING can botter illustrate the uncritical character of the synoptists than the fact that the assumed descent of Jesus from David through his father Joseph is allowed to stand side by side with the account of the miraculous conception, which completely negativs it. Of this difficulty Matthew is quite unconscious, and Luke, while vaguely noticing it (iii, 23), proposes no solution, and appears undisturbed by the contradiction.—John Fiske.

ALL I wish is to learn facts and truths and share them with others. If there is an existence superior to man, I am ready to believe if any person will giv me just one single proof. But how can I believe when evidence and proof are wanting, and I am not convinced or converted? I feel that I am only accountable to myself and my fellow-beings, and that conscience is only educated reason. We feel regret for wrongs done because we are so taught to feel, and right and wrong are in a great measure only arbitrary terms. I think even animals hav an internal monitor—that is, a feeling of right and wrong, The naturalist who studies animal nature will giv thousands of instances of this in even his limited sphere of attaining a real knowledge of their true inwardness. —Elmina D. Slenker.

IT is, happily, no longer possible to inflict legal punishment for opinion, however extreme. It is to be hoped that the days even of social punishment are numbered, and that all good men will soon heartily embrace the principle of perfect freedom of discussion, unchecked by threats either of fagots or of frowns, as the only possible guarantee for any kind of truth. Wanton outrage on the religious feelings of others, like any other wanton outrage, deserves chastisment; but there is an almost inseparable difficulty in distinguishing between blasphemy of that kind, and the free, perhaps heated, expression of sincere conviction. Is the man really trying to rescue us from error and bring us to truth? If he is, the offensivness of his manner is not a sufficient reason for molesting him; it will probably be its own penalty. Blasphemy is Infidelity in a rage; and the rage is commonly produced by futil repression.—Bystander, July 8, 1880.

THAT is not the most perfect religion that has the most perfect ecclesiastical apparatus, the grandest churches, the best remunerated priesthood, the largest following, the stateliest ceremonial. That is the most perfect religion that can do without these things, that builds no cathedrals, erects no churches, ordains no priesthood, promises no absolution, exalts no dignity of tradition and antiquity. That is the most perfect religion that, recognizing the humanity in man, can afford to dispense with everything that has distinguished religion hitherto, in order that it may show how righteousness, integrity, charity, can be made to adorn and beautify the world, for it is this religion that inaugurates the worship of the spirit in spirit and in truth.—O. B. Frothingham.

COMPARED wi' this, how poor religion's pride,
In all the pomp of method and of art,
When men display to congregations wide
Devotion's every grace except the heart.

The power, incensed, the pageant will desert,
The pompous strain, the sacerdotal stole;
But haply, in some cottage far apart,
May hear, well pleased, the language of the soul,
And in his book of life the inmates poor enroll.
—Burns.

BESIDES producing wine to the extent of over ten million gallons last year, California furnished its home market with between 75,000 and 100,000 boxes of raisins.

MRS. AMELIA LEWIS asserts in Food and Health that nearly $15,000,000 is invested in oleomargarin factories, and that they hav added nearly $4 to the value of every ox killed.

THE Prince of Naples, Crown Prince of Italy, is so sickly and puny that it is feared he will never ascend the throne of his fathers. His father and mother were double first cousins.

A MEDICAL journal of Munich says that diphtheria caught by kissing is likely to assume a much severer form than if the diseases were contracted or the contagion imparted in any other way.

THE number of medical journals started since 1679 exceeds 2,500, and our death rate is still increasing. The mortality in the journals themselvs has been large, and their present death rate is large. Annual average of births, twelve and a half.

A KENTUCKY colored clergyman is reported on his way to Chicago in search of his wife and the deacon who has eloped with her. He carries a Bible in one pocket, and says he hopes it will prevent him from using the pistol which is in another; but he isn't sure.

THERE is a division in the First Congregational church at Bangor, Me. One of the accusations against the pastor is that, after modestly retiring from a meeting while resolutions in his praise were being discussed, he listened to and watched the proceedings through the crack of a door.

MAJOR HAWKS had for more than forty years been leader of the church choir at Goshen, Mass. He grew feeble, being past 70, but could not be induced to giv up the position, or to stay away from a single service. On a late Sunday, as he was taking his accustomed place in the gallery, he fell dead.

THE Congregational church at Holbrook, Mass., has been seeking a pastor for nine years, listening during that time to sermons by 240 candidates. What a critical taste for the bread of life they must hav to be sure! and how they hav caused the spirit of hope to rise and fall in the moral thermometer!

WHAT a queer jumble of old and new this world is getting to be! Street cars rattle about in Rome, sewing machines click in Jerusalem, the Revue des Deux Mondes is taken at Bagdad, Dublin ale trickles down the Pyramids, the astonished obelisk hears the rumble of the elevated railroad, and an Illinois professor expounds Plato.

THE finances of the negro church at Cartersville, Ga., are managed on sound business principles. Every member is assessed 25 cents a month, and failure to pay is followed by expulsion. That is undoubtedly a very safe way of getting to heaven. Perhaps the adoption of the cash principle in religion is as advisable as in more worldly affairs.

THE Rev. W. G. Veal, of Dallas, Texas, gets further and further into trouble. The Methodist church found him guilty of a crime, and dismissed him from the ministry. He appealed to the Masonic fraternity for protection, and was expelled. He carried his case into a civil court, and the jury found against him. He appealed, gained a new trial, and has just been worsted again.

THE weight of the largest brain on record is said to be 67 ounces; the smallest—that of a woman—weighed but 2 ounces and 5 grains. Cuvier's brain has seldom been equaled in weight; it is noted at 64.5 ounces. The brain of James Fisk, Jr., was considered unusually large, its weight slightly exceeding 54 ounces. Yet it was 10 ounces below that of Cuvier, and 13 ounces lighter than the heaviest known.

AN esteemed reader, who, however, has not read the Sun as attentivly as he should hav done, wants to know what an Agnostic is. An Agnostic is a man who doesn't know whether there is a God or not; doesn't know whether he has a soul or not; doesn't know whether there is a future life or not; doesn't believe that any one else knows any more about these matters than he does; and thinks it a waste of time to try to find out.—Sun.

NOT being able to get rid of their pastor, an ex-Methodist brother, whose preaching they found more sensational than edifying, one hundred and fifty members of a Brooklyn Baptist church hav withdrawn in a body. Before taking their departure they assured what was left of the church that they went away with reluctance, but they really couldn't liv on any longer "unblessed, unhelped, and unhappy." An aged brother made a pathetic personal appeal to a rich brother to reconsider the matter, but the rich brother expressed the opinion that a little wholesome poverty would do the church good. The pastor thought he saw the finger of providence in it.

BOSTON total abstinence people are now excited against the Rev. Dr. Bartol on account of a sermon of his on the evil of intemperance. He took the ground that the war on rum, as commonly waged, is worse than useless. "Beer is not wrong," he said, "wine and ale are not wrong; rum and whisky and brandy are not wrong; nothing purely material could be wrong. Insobriety, inordinate self-indulgence is wrong, be the fleshy appetite for particular meat or drink what it may, and eating or drinking to excess is not the cause of profligacy, murder, theft, arson, housebreaking or any vile, indecent assault, any more than one fowl is the cause of the flock or brood." Dr. Bartol's idea is to so educate man that he will take to intellectual enjoyments, and thus lose his appetite for intoxicating beverages.

MISS GOODRICH lay for months in bed at Normal, Ill., unable to stir. Medical attention did her no good, and her family despaired of her recovery. She at length prayed in perfect faith for restoration, and was at once miraculously cured. Such is, in brief, one account of the case. Another runs that she might hav risen whenever she chose, and did so as soon as malingering lost its charm; that she was a victim of hysteria, which was acute in its manifestations, while laziness was chronic. "She was careful," says a local paper, "that her couch should not only be of down but one of style as well, and that the nightdresses, her constant wear, should be in the highest style of such robes. She never lost her appetite for a good meal, and was never lacking in the ability to digest it. In short, Miss Goodrich's case was simply that of a slothful girl who, concluding that she had been lazy long enough, got out of bed." The supernatural theory, however, is supported by her pastor and parents.

THE revival started by the chaste and heavenly Henry Ward Beecher and that engineered by the modest Rev. Talmage are both things of the past. They were both "dead failures," as the Eastern papers hav it. From this it would seem that Brooklyn is not in a hurry to shake off its sins and ascend heavenward in a cloud of glory, with Beecher and Talmage as ministering angels and spiritual guides. We turn from those sad failures to the marvelously successful work in our midst of the etherealized firm of Moody & Sankey. They hav been in San Francisco some months, and a religious journal states that if they remain much longer we shall hav such a heaven on earth here as will make sinners weep. This is a mere assertion of a merely pious editor, but the hard facts are not so encouraging. Commander-in-Chief Whitney of the Temperance Legion has been hunting up the statistics of police headquarters, and the results of his investigations show that there was a much larger number of arrests the first two months of their revival work than during the two months preceding their angelic presence. We thirst to see sinners wooed into righteousness, but for Moody and Sankey's sake we deeply lament the revelations of Commander Whitney, than whom there is not in this city a more reliable, humane, and earnest worker in what we will call common sense religion. It may not be unpleasant to add that Messrs. Moody & Sankey look fatter, sleeker, and holier than ever.—Jewish Times of San Francisco.

THE Rev. Uriel Graves is a distinguised Protestant clergyman of Pennsylvania, who has his headquarters at Greensburg, but has for years been delivering sermons all over the state. He appears to be a man of enterprise and energy, as well as experience, in the work of religion. He knows the preachers of Pennsylvania, and their ways and their preaching. He is not, so far as we know, a man who talks at random. It is surprising, under the circumstances, to read the account of the orthodox clergy of the state just made by the Rev. Uriel Graves. Here is a part of it: "There is no such thing as a minister doing his whole duty as such, who simply delivers moral essays on the Lord's day, and attends to what among the priestcraft is commonly known as the pastoral work of the parish, or more properly a communion, who are willing to be duped and betrayed by long-faced pretenders, who seek only to get their bread and living by their preaching, while they care not for the flock beyond the question of the prospectiv fleece. We would not be understood to make the above remark in any wholesale manner, for there are many who—like ourselvs once—still are serving their people in that narrow sense of which we hav already spoken; but who, nevertheless, are doing their work honestly, yet ignorantly. But having said this much explanatory, we wish to assert that by far the larger number, through ignorance or downright villainy, are serving their flocks irrespectiv of the good or ill they may do them, so they only get the milk and enjoy the shelter. To prove this, our bold assertion, we challenge the reader to find us six popular ministers in Pennsylvania who dare preach the whole truth of God to their respectiv congregations, just as Christ commanded them to, and not at once bring on the sorest troubles in their charges, and among their supporters. And that there may be no mistake, I will ask them to take the words of Christ, in his sermon on the mount, and, giving them their true and legitimate interpretation, speak out boldly the word of the Lord. Such preaching would transform or empty ninety per cent of all the pulpits of this land in less than six months." This is certainly an extraordinary accusation of the Rev. Uriel Graves against his brethren of the pulpit. That they are a priestcraft of long-faced pretenders; that they care not for the flock beyond the fleece; that they will betray their dupes for their bread; that there are not six popular ministers in Pennsylvania who could preach the truth as proclaimed by Christ without disturbance in their churches; and that the preaching of that truth by the clergy would within half a year upset ninety per cent of all the pulpits in the country, so says the Rev. Uriel Graves, and, as will be seen in the foregoing extract, he says other things still more shocking. Of course the multitude of clergymen who are thus brought to book by the Rev. Uriel Graves cannot suffer such terrible charges to be laid against them without attempting to refute them. If they had come from an Infidel, or a scoffer, or an idolator, or a fool, they might hav been allowed to echo unheeded through the country; but, coming from a man who is himself a preacher, and who wears the title that belongs to the clergy, they should be a theme for every pulpit of the church.—Sun.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK IN OPPOSITION TO A BILL TO LARGELY INCREASE THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, MARCH 23, 1881.

COMSTOCK'S LIBELS UPON LIBERALS.—THE SENTIMENTS OF THE LEAGUE AND ITS MEMBERS.

The Liberals of the country concluded the organization of their Liberal League at Philadelphia on the Centennial 4th of July, 1876. Among the many matters presented and approved during their sitting of four days were two resolutions offered by Mr. B. F. Underwood—than whom a less likely advocate of obscenity cannot possibly be found—as follows:

"1. Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications (whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor), disapproves and protests against all laws which by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"2. Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free instituions."

This Agent has no greater sense of decency or justice than to call this action proclaiming "the bans between Infidelity and Obscenity," and that the Liberals "defended obscenity for the love of it" (pp. 446–7), when they have never defended it at all, but exactly the contrary. This illustrates the color-blindness or moral obliquity of this man as to the motives of others, which disqualifies him for any public duty that brings him in contact with those not of his sect. He cannot be fair if he tries, and he shows no disposition to try. The League has always been consistent upon this subject. At its Rochester, Syracuse, Cincinnati, and Chicago (1880) Congresses, it has persistently and alone of all public bodies sustained both Liberty and Purity. There is no time nor need to quote their utterances year after year, the last is this:

From Resolution V. of the Chicago Congress of the National Liberal League, September, 1880:

"V. While we demand equal rights for all, and the consequent freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails, we do not do this to aid, abet, or encourage obscenity, lotteries, financial frauds, bogus medical diploma's, nor any form of immorality, crime, or wrong-doing whatsoever; on the contrary, we are utterly opposed to the dissemination through the mails, or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether inspired or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt and disgust its authors and disseminators."

Again it says:

"We are in favor of enforcing, and we guarantee our efforts and influence to enforce, reasonable and effective laws in aid of the common law against obscenity, lotteries, bogus diplomas, financial and other frauds; but we believe that such offenses can be and should be effectively punished and repressed in the same way that other offenses are, that is, by the common criminal laws and courts aided by police and detective officers, who shall be responsible to the people or their elected officers, and not to churches or amateur theological, criminal societies."

This Agent (p. 508–10) quotes a part of the resolutions of this Chicago Congress until they came near convincing himself, and he has even to apologize for their "plausibility" as follows:

"The difficulty in dealing with the National Liberal League is that it constantly puts forth some new or reaffirms some old platform or passes voluminous resolutions, which on their face appear, to say the least, to be plausible, while their acts are at variance with the highest interests of the people, which they would have the public understand by their platforms and utterances they are so zealous to guard" (p. 510).

Why could not this man be honest enough to state the views and motives avowed by the Liberals instead of constantly saying through pages of slanderous epithets that they are merely obscenists, smut dealers or defenders, etc.? There is no kind of falsehood more mean and detestable than lying about the motives of others, especially to or before those who have no means of detecting the falsehood. When he does quote from the Liberals it is put in fine print with large-type comments totally falsifying and perverting the quotation which is scarcely ever read; for instance, on page 450 he prints:

"OUR PRESENT PLATFORM, immediate, unconditional, and permanent repeal of all laws against obscenity whether municipal, state, or national."

He prints this so that it will be taken by any casual reader to be the platform of the League itself. He knew that it not only was not, but was the private expression of Mr. Heywood in opposition to the League, and the non-acceptance of which was the reason that he would not join it; that therefore he has never been a member of the League nor had anything to do with it.

The League has always maintained the common sense and common law position. The attempt to foist the above expression upon them by big print is a fraud, but transparent only to the few who know the facts. Remember that he has no ordinary slander power. He knows that he reaches a large part of the public who know nothing of Liberals or their publications, and therefore regard them with the greatest disfavor. He reaches the clergy, and they the churches and the religious press and the Sunday-schools and a large part of the secular press, and so by his wicked perversions he leads one part of the community to abhor the other. This is done under an official oath and the authority that the general government and the State give him practically to bear false witness against his neighbor.

THE U. S. POSTAL LAWS.

Take as another instance his treatment of the position of the Liberals in regard to his United States postal laws, which they state in their Chicago platform thus in their sixth resolution, which has been harped upon as some enormity, and therefore notwithstanding its length I quote it all. There is not a word of it that will not find an echo of approval in the heart of every true American.

"VI. Upon the grounds before stated we are unable to approve of the so-called "Comstock legislation" in either the States or general government, and we believe its results have proved it to be fraught with serious danger to the equal rights and liberties of the people.

"1. The incorporation within the several States of amateur semi-criminal, semi-theological societies, and the employment of their agents, in no way responsible to the people, to make accusations and arrests under laws enacted at their instigation, is an exhibition of theological assumption and governmental interference hostile to the impartiality and equality of secular and popular government, which should be of the people, for the people, and by the people; that such laws and administration of criminal affairs practically deprive the citizen of his common-law right of liberty, which he has until he injures another's person or property, or is accused in the first instance by a grand jury of his peers.

"2. The general government, as the agent of the States and the people, in providing the postal service, holds in time of peace substantially the relation of a common carrier; that to admit its right to discriminate as to the meaning of matter which it would carry would admit of a power that may be used arbitrarily for the suppression of particular classes of thought on political, religious, social, and moral subjects, and would, therefore, be inconsistent with the total separation of church and state, which is the prime demand of the National Liberal League.

"We also urge the repeal of the present United States postal laws, known as the Comstock laws, for these as further reasons:

"That, in the view of many whose judgment we respect, such laws are unconstitutional. They give to the United States a criminal jurisdiction, dangerous, and unlimited, extending to every offense as to which it may be claimed that the post-office may have been 'misused' in its commission. Such laws also make the employment of decoy letters, deceit, and espionage a necessary and recognized process of our criminal law, and so break down all confidence in the inviolability of the mails and in the public morality of the government and of the people. Under such laws printed and other matter may be condemned and confiscated before publication and without trial. That thus practically a postal censorship is constituted which violates the freedom of the press and speech as well as of the right of property; while by the trick of getting a letter or paper sent through a post-office, even within the same State, the 'Agent' under these laws gets jurisdiction in the United States courts over common-law offenses, so that a trial is had before a judge appointed for life, and not responsible to the people, and a jury who are not practically the peers nor of the vicinage of the accused, and where the definition of the court may leave the jury no alternative but to convict.

"That while, therefore, we do not approve of any offenses that may have been charged upon Lant, Train, Dr. Foote, Heywood, Bennett, or others, we regard their accusation and conviction as outrages that far exceed in enormity any offense charged upon them. We regard such cases as attacks upon our common law and constitutional rights and liberties, which must be resisted hereafter to the uttermost, and we recommend the appointment of a special Defense Committee of this League, under Art. III., section 4, of its Constitution, to which all questions of this kind, and all others within the meaning of that section, may be referred.

"We also demand a change in the administration of the law in regard to the trial of such cases, so that the jury, and no judge or censor, may be the judges of both the law and the fact in all cases of obscene libels, as they are now in all other cases of libel; that all laws necessary in regard to these subjects be enforced by officers responsible to the people and the secular government only; that all special amateur societies above referred to should be abolished, and that Anthony Comstock and similar agents should be dismissed and have no pretense of legal sanction and protection in their course of inquisition, falsehood, and outrage."

The Liberals are maligned by this Agent as the most despicable and loathsome of human beings simply for thus avowing their belief that the Federal Government of the United States is one of powers specially granted and limited by the Constitution. They do not believe because these powers are exercised through departments, that therefore it can use these departments (e. g., the United States Postal Department) for any ulterior, political, moral, or criminal purpose it may fancy. This, they say, is simply to throw away the Constitution and to give the General Government unlimited criminal and other jurisdiction, and, in the end, absolute power. And they also believe that this Legislation "abridges the freedom of the press," and therefore the liberty of the people. The post-office is the necessity of every civilized person, and the principal means of publication. Every person has a free and equal right to its use, and to the right of publication by it without prior restraint, espionage, or forfeiture of his property. He is liable for the abuse of these rights just as he is liable for other abuses, but he cannot be constitutionally deprived of them beforehand by postal censorship established by Congress.

It is well known that these questions were fully discussed in the Senate of the United States in 1836 in reference to mailing "incendiary" matter in the Slave States. The greatest statesmen our country has ever had, headed by Webster and Calhoun, decided that no authority existed in the United States government to discriminate as to the "meaning of mailed matter" for any purpose.

I have quoted from this debate in my Faneuil Hall speech (pages 18 to 20), but the view of Henry Clay contains what the Liberals lay such stress upon by way of remedy for the evils complained of that it cannot be omitted in any statement of their opinions on the subject.

In that debate Henry Clay said: "When I saw that the exercise of a most extraordinary and dangerous power had been announced by the head of the post-office, and that it had been sustained by the President's message, I turned my attention to the subject and inquired whether it was necessary that the general government should, under any circumstances, exercise such power, and whether they possessed it. After much reflection, I have come to the conclusion that they could not pass any law interfering with the subject in any shape or form whatever. The evil complained of is the circulation of papers having a certain tendency. The papers, unless circulated, and while in the post-office, could do no harm; it is the circulation solely—the taking out of the mail and the use to be made of them—that constitutes the evil. Then it is perfectly competent to the State authorities to apply the remedy. The instant that a prohibited paper is handed out, whether to a citizen or to a sojourner, he is subject to the laws which compel him either to surrender or burn it."

Thus it was that this so-called horrible doctrine of the Liberals was entertained by the statesmen of the past.

How does it strike a fair, pure, disciplined, but fearless, man of our time? That you may see from this

LETTER FROM REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM:

50 WEST 36TH ST., NEW YORK, Nov. 18, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: Your note of the 10th inst. admonishes me of a duty that should have been discharged before—the duty of telling you that your argument on the United States "Comstock Postal Law" has made me an advocate of repeal vs. modification. The discussion of this autumn has brought me to the conclusion that this is the simple, logical, sensible and only satisfactory method of dealing with this obnoxious piece of legislation.

The Liberals of the other opinion call for repeal of as much of the law as threatens freedom of thought and discussion. The insolent association of Freethought with obscenity stirs my indignation that for honor's sake, if for no other reason, I should feel compelled to demand that the whole be swept away.

The friends of decency must look for safeguards elsewhere.

Yours cordially, O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

T. B. Wakeman, Esq.

In a similar way the matter has struck the minds of Hon. Elizur Wright, the venerable President of the League, Mr. James Parton, Mr. Parker Pill-bury, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and the great mass of the members of the League.

But still further. A very large portion of the press has come to the same conclusion; for instance, among hundreds of expressions, take the following instances:

UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE COMSTOCK POSTAL LAW.

An editorial in the New York Sun of Dec. 23, 1878, contains the following sensible remarks:

"We do not believe in the constitutionality of the United States law under which this conviction [Heywood's] took place. The government has nothing to do with the moral or intellectual quality of the matter transmitted through the mails. It has no right of discrimination. If it may discriminate for a good purpose, it may discriminate for a bad purpose. The power is fraught with too much danger of abuse to be safely intrusted to the government.

"In early antislavery times a determined effort was made to exclude from the mails in the slaveholding States every denunciation of the sum of all iniquities—human slavery. The people protested against the espionage put upon the mails, against the interference with the freedom of the press. We condemn the attempt to interfere with the mails now, though it be with a very different intent, because it violates the same great essential principles of liberty."

In the Sun of March 22, 1881, similar views are repeated. We might quote to almost any extent to the same effect from the press, but forbear.

Now the relevant question is, how does this Agent answer these arguments, convincing to at least a very large and respectable body of our fellow-citizens and to many of our greatest and purest men? How does he treat such men? He answers in a way that is a disgrace and a shame to human nature. He opens his ever-present and congenial smut bag (he our principal smut dealer and exhibitor), whips out some disgusting instrument of crime, and shouts, "O you Liberal Leagues, you Wright, Frothingham & Co! You miscreants 'wedded to obscenity!' You are all really obscenists and in favor of this ——, and this [pulling out his favorite smut book and flourishing it in triumph]. This I took from a monster who was distributing it to your daughters at school. This I took from a wretch who was committing an abortion. This was from the devil who left this scar on my cheek. Will you desert me now? Will you leave society to the mercy of these moral monsters and their defenders and friends, the Liberals?"

Instead of kicking this dirty fraud, who insults reason and decent men in this way, into the gutter, as he richly deserves, he generally has it all his own way. His audience, "admitted by ticket," fall prostrate before him, paralyzed with horror and without the slightest power of thought. They give him ample contributions, and worry Legislatures to pass his laws from winter to winter. Is it not time for this wretched and stupid libel to come to an end?

Notice, too, that he slanders not only the moral motives but the political position of these men, speaking of them as resisting the Supreme Court and guilty of a crime in so doing. He speaks of "silly talk" in that regard as though Liberals were all fools. Such they would be if they took no broader view of the matter than he does. To them the question has ceased to be a legal one simply and has become a political one. Every political party has been based upon an adverse decision of the United States court. So was it from the Alien and Sedition laws down to the Dred Scott decision. This question will soon be accepted as a political question by the old parties or it will found a new one.

THE LEAGUE NOT IN FAVOR OF REPEAL OF ALL LAWS.

Another and a very favorite libel of the Agent is that the Liberals are in favor of the repeal of all laws against obscenity and in favor of flooding the mails, and indeed the whole country, with the vilest filth.

This he repeats ad nauseam.

There is not a word of truth in it, as the resolutions already quoted show, and as the bill we now ask you to substitute for his proves to you. We ask to put a Comstock for all the good he can do in every County. We ask, also, to make every policeman, constable, postmaster, and good citizen his effective aid and ally.

This must be effective, for if there is no offensive matter in the States there will be none in the United States. The States can thus, as Henry Clay pointed out, punish the offender and put an efficient stop to the evil. This was actually done by the Slave States as to "incendiary" literature. Not a copy of the Liberator or Tribune could get circulated from the post-office in a Southern state, because of the State laws. Let us be as wise now as they were in their day and generation, and the evil will be remedied by State laws, without violating the Constitution or bringing in the very great damages and evils of giving the United States unlimited and dangerous criminal jurisdiction.

This the Liberals have asked for persistently and consistently, and this the Agent almost bursts himself in shouting over as evidence of their total depravity!

Comstock Indicted.

On the 13th the foreman of the grand jury handed to Judge Cowing in the General Sessions Court an indictment against Anthony Comstock for an offense committed in November, 1879. The complainant was Mrs. F. M. Hoffman, now residing at 105 Alexander avenue, but who resided at the time of the high-handed outrage at No. 156 East Fifty-second street. The story she tells is one that is well in keeping with the browbeating, bulldozing character of the notorious Comstock.

Mrs. Hoffman says that on the afternoon of November 5, 1879, she was sitting quietly in her room, when the door opened and a man entered whom she had never seen before. This intruder was a burly fellow with beetling brows and the look of a bully. His eyes flashed ominously, and the repulsivness of his evil countenance was hightened by an ugly scar across one cheek. He was accompanied by another man, also an evil-looking person, but who stood behind the other and seemed to be a sort of servant.

Despite the unceremonious manner in which these two persons had entered her apartment, and although they were most forbidding in appearance, Mrs. Hoffman arose politely and asked them what they wanted. The most villainous in appearance of the two then assumed a ferocious air and immediately charged the lady with sending obscene literature through the mails. The suddenness and audaciousness of so baseless a charge, together with the man's rascally expression and the manner in which he had entered the room, almost unnerved the unprotected woman. But she rallied and asked the fellow's name.

He refused to giv his name, and continued his browbeating manner, accusing Mrs. Hoffman of writing and sending obscene and scandalous matter through the mails. He said that she had sent letters of this character to people in front of her and behind her, and to the East and to the West. Mrs. Hoffman protested her innocence, but the fellow, who she afterward learned was Anthony Comstock, would listen to nothing, violently declaring that the lady was guilty, and acting as if she were trying to confess.

Then Comstock, still acting as if toward a criminal, continued to accuse her of the offense charged, and finally asked her if she did not wish to compromise the matter. In what way he proposed to bring about this peculiar proposition he did not say, for Mrs. Hoffman indignantly resented the imputation it contained, and again protested her utter innocence, declaring that she had nothing to conceal.

Comstock then produced from his pocket a letter, and, with a leer of triumph, handed it to the lady, still holding it, however, and demanded if the superscription of the envelope was not in her handwriting. She recognized it as a letter which she had written to a young lady acquaintance, and replied that she had directed the envelope. Comstock pretended to chuckle with satisfaction at this, and in the same bullying manner produced two other letters and demanded to know if Mrs. Hoffman had not written those as well. These were not in her handwriting, and she promptly denied their authorship.

Mrs. Hoffman was naturally very much frightened at the presence of two unknown men in her room, one of whom made such grave charges and acted so violently, and she determined to leave the room. She succeeded in getting out into hall, when Comstock followed her, and, seizing her by the arm, began to drag her back into the room, saying that he had a warrant for her arrest. As she was being dragged in she shouted to a little girl in the house to run for Captain Mount. Comstock continued pulling her until he got her in the room, when he slammed the door and repeated that he had a warrant for her arrest.

She asked him to show the warrant, but he only exhibited a shield, which she thinks was that of a deputy sheriff. Comstock had also inquired about Mrs. Hoffman's husband—whether he was at home and where he was in business; also as to the places she had lived at in the city. When Comstock found that Mrs. Hoffman could not be frightened into a compromise he went away.

The story of Mrs. Hoffman was substantiated by the little girl, Rosa Horman, whom she asked to go for Captain Mount; and also by Mrs. Pauline Stern, who occupied the apartment directly beneath those of Mrs. Hoffman. The latter testified that she heard a noise, and heard a man say, "You walk in here, Madam. I hav a warrant for your arrest," and then he slammed the door. She also heard Mrs. Hoffman call to Rosa.

After this Comstock came to Mrs. Stern's room in company with another man, and said that he had brought the assistant United States district attorney with him. He then asked her if she had heard scuffling or noise, and she told him that she had not. This was after Mrs. Hoffman had begun proceedings against Comstock. He then continued to say that the woman up-stairs had said he refused to giv his name, but Mrs. Stern told him that her house was not a place to testify, and he went away.

All the witnesses in the case were before the grand jury on the 13th, and after having testified to the facts related the grand jury unanimously voted for an indictment. The case has been pending for a year and a half, and is the same upon which Comstock was held in $500 bonds soon afterward before Justice F. Sherman Smith.

The result of this trial greatly frightened Comstock, and he at once sent his society's counsel, Elbridge T. Gerry, to the district attorney's office to see if something could not be done to ward off action in the matter. Mr. Gerry was successful, and for nearly two years the matter has remained untouched. When Mr. Rollins took charge of the office, however, he could see no reason why Comstock should be treated differently from other transgressors, and consequently sent the case to the grand jury, with the result seen.

When the fact that Comstock had been indicted had crept about, the people in and around the district attorney's office were in great good humor, and laughed heartily as they canvassed the probable result. There was a diversity of opinion in this respect, but the unanimity of expression as to how the affair should terminate was striking.

The indictment of Anthony Comstock for his assault on Mrs. Hoffman comes about a year later than it should, but it is better late than never. The infamous license on which Comstock has been prowling about, grubbing a hyena existence from vices often of his own creation, needs some such check to be put upon it. Even if he escapes conviction, the trial to which the indictment will lead will inevitably reveal some details of his methods which cannot fail to open the eyes of the people to the monstrous absurdity of putting such a creature on a footing independent of all law himself, but armed with tyrannical powers over others.

If the story Mrs. Hoffman tells is true the operations of Comstock hav a far less legitimate purpose than he givs them out as having. There is a strong savor of blackmail about the account Comstock's victim givs of her encounter with him. It remains to be seen if her statements can be sustained.

In any event, the Hoffman scandal should fully open the eyes of the people to the character of the man who is now before the legislature demanding sovereign power over all men and women in the land; over their personal liberty, from the letters they write and receive, the confidences husbands make to their wives and parents to their children, to their right to come and go about their private businesses. It should show in his true colors this slinking bully of women, who dares to set himself up as a censor of the morals of a nation upon which his own existence is the foulest stain.

If after that exposure Anthony Comstock finds any consideration for his schemes for further intrenching himself in his outrageous position against society, it will not be because his unfitness for any place but one well within the reach of the laws he wants a monopoly of has not been clearly shown up.

[From Truth of April 13th.]

Comstock Losing his Grip.

Comstock persists in his effort to get the House Committee on Charitable and Religious Societies to report his unconstitutional bill, and in his last effort he and Assemblyman Andrews came very nearly to the point where words cease and blows come in, but Andrews was not to be bullied and he got the grapevine lock on his man and threw him to grass.

Andrews charged Comstock with being a bigot who would persecute men for mere opinion's sake—a dangerous man to entrust with power which the regularly constituted authorities should and do hav. He charged that it had been reliably stated that Comstock had entered the New York post-office and opened letters. This nettled Comstock, who sprang from his seat exclaiming, "That is an infamous libel, and I will not sit here and listen to it." But this in no wise nonplussed Mr. Andrews, who continued, pointing his finger at Comstock: "I know that man, gentleman of the committee, that infamous wretch who rejoices in hounding men to death. You, sir, hav driven innocent men and women to suicide, but you can't bully me."

Comstock made no reply, and after apologizing to the committee for the warmth of temper which Comstock's action and the bill on its merits had brought out, Mr. Andrews closed an able argument, followed by Waring in favor of the bill.

It is said that several votes were taken in executiv session of the committee on the bill, and that a deadlock ensued on all efforts to get the bill reported. The chances seem to be now against the bill.

Comstock and Waring were also heard before the House Judiciary Committee on Col. Murphy's Spy and Informers bill, and the bill having been recommitted for this hearing will probably be reported favorably at an early hour.

Without doubting there can be no progress.—Darwin.

Our Tenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I notice how dextrously you try to dodge the many quotations which I gave you in my last, and have come to the conclusion that you would be a pretty artful dodger if no one interfered with you. But however much agility you display in this line, I can hardly let you have your own way altogether. I am a little amused, if not surprised, to see how cavalierly you attempt with one swoop to throw overboard such men as Dr. Middleton, Mosheim, Greg, Prof. Newman, Judge Waite, Dr. Davidson, Dr. Whiston, the Rev. James Martineau, Archbishop Wake, Bishop Marsh, and several others. Do you, indeed, think yourself a personage of sufficient caliber, with a single twist of the wrist, to toss all these recognized able writers aside? If you so consider yourself it is quite possible that others may estimate you differently.

Even if you possess this ability, I submit that it is hardly generous in you to pronounce the Rev. John W. Chadwick, though indeed "a townsman" of yours, "a man of shallow scholarship." May I ask you how much you know about his scholarship, and whether you have a reliable meter by which you measure the scholarship of others? Allow me to differ with you a trifle about Mr. Chadwick's scholarship. On the Bible he has shown himself extremely well read, and I pronounce him better authority upon that subject than fifty thousand of the orthodox clergymen of our country. He does not claim to have originated all that he has given us in his "Bible of To-Day," but duly gives credit to Ewald, Kuenen, DeWitte, Knappert, and others than whom probably no abler Bible students have lived. Mr. Chadwick's book will undoubtedly live and be appreciated long after his traducers are forgotten.

Your slur cast at Dr. Davidson will hardly serve to send him entirely to oblivion. He is one of the ablest divines of Great Britain, and your fling at his title of D.D. seems hardly in good taste. Is a degree of scholarship obtained at one of the first institutions of learning in the world a thing of no worth? The very fact that he was one of the number selected to write the articles of the Encyclopedia Britannica is sufficient guarantee of his scholarship and reliability. His decision that "oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge," will probably be allowed to stand as an axiom of truth despite your effort to overthrow it.

In like manner your attempts to disparage Greg, Prof. Newman, and Judge Waite are equally unsuccessful. They have spent many years of their lives in close study of the literature pertaining to the books of the New Testament and the history of the early Fathers of the church; and in view of this fact let us hope you will spare them a little of the reputation they have justly earned. If you cannot be entirely merciful, be as merciful as you can.

I perceive that it is extremely easy for you to discredit and decry any author that cannot contract his mind to accept all you do. If he cannot believe that a person is his own father, or is as old as his father, you readily set him down as one whose opinion is unworthy of consideration. If he is a Unitarian he must necessarily be untruthful; if he is a Quaker he is not to be quoted; while if he should chance to be an unbeliever, an Infidel, he is not to be tolerated at all among authors. Nobody must quote him or regard him with favor. Now all this may be eminently Christian, but it is not fair or just. I cannot see why a partial or total unbeliever in the dogmas of Christianity is not fully as worthy of belief and respect as though he swallowed the entire Thirty-Nine Articles, with his mouth agape asking for more. No, no; I cannot relinquish my authorities at your dictum. I shall persistently adhere to them unless you show them to be false.

If you are allowed to make such assertions as you please, to parade your orthodox authorities whose opinions come up to the accepted standard, and are permitted to throw overboard all who have not the requisite measure of faith, or whose testimony is damaging to your pet theory, you can doubtless establish it for truth that the four canonical gospels were written by the four names attached to them, and that they were in the hands of the apostolic and Christian Fathers and believers all along in the first and second centuries. But nothing of the kind is the truth. Dr. Davidson is eminently correct when he says, "Oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge," and that "the formation of a Catholic church and of a canon was simultaneous," and so is Prof. Newman, when, after long research, he informs us that there is no proof that the four canonical gospels were known or referred to prior to the year 170. You cannot overthrow what these men have written.

With all the assurance of an oracle you make the astonishing assertion that "the books [the four gospels] were inspired and authoritative from the moment they were first published without the sanction of any human assembly." I pronounce this as untrue, and ask you by what authority you can say that either of them was written by inspiration? Not one of the writers states, or even claims, that he was inspired, and nothing in the productions themselves gives the slightest proof that they were inspired. The "inspiration" is simply a dogma of the church. The production of a poet or an orator often bears evidence of what is called inspiration—a something superior to ordinary effort; but the gospels are bungling, imperfect, contradictory narratives, with not the first indication that there is any inspiration about them, but numerous indications that they could not have been inspired by a being of infinite truth and wisdom. The claim that "they were authoritative from the moment they were first published without the sanction of any human assembly," is equally untrue. The fact that Irenæus made a labored and silly argument in their defense about the year 170 (and that was the first time the four gospels had been mentioned), that Origen, fifty years later, made out the first accepted list of New Testament books, and that several councils were subsequently called to settle the question of the canon, utterly disproves it. The last of these councils was held as late as the year 680, when the decisions of the previous council were considerably reversed. It is asserted that at one of these councils—"geese and cranes"—when the inspiration of the several books was settled by vote, that ascribed to Luke was admitted by a single vote. If that is so, its inspiration must be accepted as rather "thin."

You taunt me with using second-hand quotations "unworthy of credence." Indeed, must I manufacture my quotations and not use any that have been used before? Was there anything in the terms of our discussion stipulating that I should quote nothing that had been quoted before? Would my quotation be any more reliable were such a rule agreed to? Or does it destroy the truth of a quotation to give it the second time? "Unworthy of credence," indeed! That fling is most uncourteous and uncalled for. My quotations have been from the best of sources, and are, in my candid opinion, far more truthful than the system which you advocate. And do you quote no authorities whom others have quoted? Are all your quotations first-hand and none of them second-hand? As to the "credence" of your authorities and mine, we will leave it with our readers to settle.

With a flourish of trumpets you quote some passages from Paul, and seem to imagine that you have demolished my claim that Paul made no reference to the physical resurrection and ascension of Jesus. I cannot think you have accomplished it. Let me assure you that when Paul talked about the resurrection of Jesus, and of his being seen by the disciples and himself, he meant a spiritual resurrection; that he meant not the body which was born of Mary and was placed upon the cross, and which became a mass of dead flesh; he referred to the immortal part—the spirit. In contradistinction to the Sadducees, a numerous sect of the Jews, he believed in a state of existence after death, when the spirit survives the decomposition of the body. There are no grounds for believing that when he claims to have had a vision of Jesus while on his way to Damascus he beheld the physical body which was scourged and impaled; and from the narration in Acts ix, Paul saw nothing. It says, "Suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven, and he fell to the earth, and he heard a voice." It does not say that he saw Jesus either in body or spirit, and that the men with him heard the voice, but saw no man. It is evident that Paul meant that he saw Jesus in spirit. Had the body of Jesus been there, the companions of Paul would undoubtedly have seen it.

The anti-corporeal or anti-physical resurrection which Paul believed in can be correctly gathered from his remarks on the subject further along in the same fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians from which you quoted, where he shows the resurrection to be spiritual, and not physical, and that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven. If we credit him with the correct meaning of the language he used, he could have had no allusion to a physical resurrection of Jesus. He could not be so mistaken as to think a physical body could pass through the walls of a house and enter a room without the door being opened. But in opposition to all evidence, you choose to insist that Paul believed in a physical resurrection.

What about his allusion to the physical ascension of Jesus's body up into heaven? Will you be kind enough to point out the passages where Paul asserted the physical ascension? If Jesus really ascended bodily up into heaven, it was the most remarkable event that ever took place—a wonderful finale to a short and wonderful career. If such a thing did happen, Paul was very culpable not to fully and accurately describe the occurrence; and the same remarks will apply to Mark and John. If the body of Jesus was taken up into heaven, and if they wrote a truthful account of what took place, they could not have ignored this most remarkable and most important event of all. By no mention being made of it by John, by Mark, and by Paul, there are the best of reasons for concluding that no such event ever took place; and I must insist that no writing of the first century made any allusion to it. Like the immaculate conception and being born of a virgin, it was wholly an invention of the second century. In view of all this, let me say that, compared with what you term the "extreme rashness of assertion of Infidel bias" and of Infidel "blunders," Christian rashness and Christian blunders east those of Infidels far in the shade. You Christians bear away the palm.

It pleases you more than once to dwell upon the testimony which Celsus and Porphyry are supposed to have given of the authenticity of the four gospels. I am not aware that they gave any such testimony, and even if they did, it would amount to no more than the testimony of any other two men who knew nothing about it. They did not live in the days of the apostles. They did not see those books written, nor had they the least knowledge who wrote them. Even if they yielded their tacit assent that they were written by those whose names they bear they had no more grounds for doing so than millions of others have had since their day. Whatever they knew of the writers of those books, they certainly did not believe them, and if they are the best authorities you have to depend upon to uphold your dubious gospels, your cause is weak indeed. Besides, when it is remembered that all that was written by those two men was destroyed by the Christians, your reference to them is in questionable taste.

Yes, I still deny that the canonical gospels can justly claim any superiority over the others on the score of inspiration, reliability, and straightforward narration. One set appears to be as well written as the other, and neither can boast of superior ability. One is as apocryphal as the other. They are about of a piece, and all of them not of as much real value as one chapter from Humboldt, Lyell, or Proctor.

You speak of Cerinthus and Matthew, but let me assure you that there is no proof that Cerinthus knew anything about the gospel or story ascribed to Matthew, now occupying the first place in the New Testament. There might have been an older story or version sometimes called the gospel according to the Hebrews, and sometimes the gospel of Matthew, and which was known to the Jewish sect, the Ebionites, but it certainly was not the gospel now ascribed to Matthew; the former was in the Hebrew, while our gospel of Matthew was written in Greek and was not translated from the Hebrew. Matthew could not write Greek, and never wrote the gospel which the Christian world has been taught to believe he wrote. The learned authorities agree that the canonical gospel was never translated from the Hebrew, but was written originally in Greek, and that the Ebionites could not use a Greek manuscript. If Matthew ever did write a gospel—which is a matter of very great doubt—it was in Hebrew, and was lost nearly eighteen hundred years ago and has never been seen since. The most reasonable conclusion is that there was an old, brief gospel ascribed to Matthew, as all the gospels, to give them weight and character among the credulous, were ascribed to one of the apostles or their companions, and was usually called the gospel according to the Hebrews, but was not the one now named after Matthew. This last one, I repeat, was gotten up in the second century, never was seen by Matthew, and never was written in Hebrew.

There is no proof that anybody earlier than Irenæus ever saw the present gospel of Matthew, and that after his time the gospel of the Hebrews was not seen or known. And right here it must be stated as a fact that if Matthew ever did write a gospel narrative, and God wished him to do it, and helped him at the job, he was very careless about the preservation of it, for like many of the other narratives or gospels of a similar kind it was utterly lost, and a new one had to be gotten up by somebody else in the second century and christened Matthew. The current gospel is evidently a compilation, the same events being repeated in an unskilful manner and not as a good writer would naturally perform his labor. That Matthew never wrote and never saw the book now bearing his name is one of the most palpable truths ever uttered. And Mr. Davidson is right when he says, "Oral tradition was the chief foundation of Christian knowledge."

Midst all the myths, doubt, uncertainty, and utter want of historical connection in the story of Jesus and his believers, the most natural conclusion to arrive at is that the Christian sect grew out of the sect of the Essenes of Judea and the Therapeuts of Egypt, and that the religious writings of the two older sects were appropriated by the newer sect, as Eusebius himself seemed to believe when he said some of the gospels came from Egypt. I have before spoken of the close resemblance between the teachings of the Therapeuts and Essenes and many passages in the gospels, and am sorry that I have not the room to quote fifty or more instances of this in addition to those already indicated, which I could easily do, thereby showing that the real source of the gospels was those older, strict, self-denying religious sects. There might have been a humble, illiterate, inoffensive individual by the name of Jesus, but he was not the personage whom the Christians of the second century devised; he was not born of a virgin, he had a natural father, he did not perform miracles, he was not taken up bodily into heaven. All these things were the inventions of the crafty zealots of the second century, and I again repeat that there is no proof that any of these things were even claimed in the first century.

Of Jesus it may be said, as of many who lived before him and since, that he is a progressive character; he grows better by age, as those who believe in him increase in knowledge and the better qualities of which humanity is capable. At first he was a crude, natural sort of person, and has been growing more refined, more exalted, more faultless and perfect, even down to the present day. It is the same with Yahweh—miscalled Jehovah—of the Jews. At first he was a crude, irrascible, impatient, impetuous, cruel, blood-thirsty character, who delighted in the sacrifice of thousands of innocent animals for his pleasure, and who ordered and directed the most bloody war operations on many occasions, and delighted in slaying hundreds of thousands of his own creatures. He delighted to call himself the "Lord of Hosts," the "God of War," and the "God of Battles," It seemed to suit him better to see rivers of blood flowing than anything else, but he has been improving somewhat, in taste, disposition, and propensities, for three thousand years, until now he does not wish sheep, rams, heifers, and bulls to be slaughtered and burnt for him to smell of and look upon, nor does he delight in war, carnage, and human bloodshed so much as he used to; and even some of his adulators go so far as to say that he is a God of peace and love and wishes men to live together on the earth in a friendly, peaceful manner. It is a cause for gratitude that all the gods which men have devised seem to improve from century to centnry in the qualities that adorn mankind. This is a proof that all the gods believed in over the world are just about what their makers make them. If the makers are cruel, blood-thirsty, and revengeful, their gods will be so too; and when the makers grow civilized, refined, humane, and gentle, their gods do the same. Let us be glad that the gods can follow in the lead of progressive human beings, and not always remain on the crude, animal plain where the race once stood. It looks more and more as though mankind will after a while get so far progressed that they will be able to get along without any god at all save the glorious old universe, of which they are a part. Brahma, Vishuu, Ormuzd, Fohi, Jove, Yahweh, and Jesus, when that day comes, can retire from business, and leave mankind to follow out the good intentions and kindly dispositions inherent in them; or they will become so progressed, ethereal, beautiful, and non-combative as to be of not the slightest injury or danger to the human race.

Your effort to sustain Irenæus strikes me as not strong. The old Father doubtless had zeal enough, but it is hard to escape the conviction that he was either a liar or a fool. I must insist that the absurd reasons which he gave why there should be just four gospels and no more—the fact, you will remember, he was the first to discover—was because there were four principal winds, four corners of the earth, and because Christ sat in the midst of cherubim with four faces. When the facts are kept in view that the winds blow from every point of the compass, that there are no corners to the earth, and that cherubim with four faces were never seen, Irenæus's senseless authority for four gospels is not worth a straw. If his four gospels are no truer than his reasons for them, they are not worthy a moment's consideration. His pretended quotation from John how that in the future every vine should have ten thousand shoots, every shoot ten thousand branches, every branch ten thousand twigs, every twig ten thousand clusters, every cluster ten thousand grapes, yielding each twenty-five measures of wine, is most untrue, for nothing of the kind is in John. And how ridiculous the statement! By a slight practice in multiplication you will see that every vine would yield 10,000,000,000,000,000 clusters of ten thousand grapes each; far more than all the vines of the earth have produced. A man capable of such arguments, and making such statements, is very unsafe authority for preëxisting gospels or anything pertaining to them. He must indeed be a lunatic or a great falsifier. And it is upon the testimony of this man more than any other that we are asked to believe that four gospels were given from God for the salvation of the world.

Excuse him as you please, it must be admitted that if the first three canonical gospels convey the truth that the ministry of Jesus lasted but one year, Irenæus must hav falsified when he stated that it was twenty years. The fourth gospel splitting the difference and making it from four to seven years does not help the misrepresentation of Irenæus. By the whole we see how unreliable the story is. If the first publisher of the four gospels could do no better than make the ministry of Jesus twenty times longer than it was his character for truth and accuracy must have been very bad indeed.

In leaving the subject of the canon and the early Fathers I will take the space to quote a few passages from the article "Bible," Encyclopedia Britannica, by the Rev. W. Robertson Smith, Professor of Hebrew, Free Church College, Aberdeen, Scotland. Like yourself he accepts the teachings of Calvin, and you will hardly toss him over with the Unitarians and Infidels. Here are his words, and they were doubtless penned with great care: "What Matthew really wrote in Aramaic was different from the book which now bears his name. . . All the earliest external evidence points to the conclusion that the synoptical gospels are non-apostolic digests of spoken and written apostolic tradition, and that the earlier material in orderly form took place only gradually in many ways. With this the internal evidence agrees. The three first gospels are often in such remarkable accord, even in miracles and accidental points of expression, that it is certain either that they copied one another, or that all have some sources in common. . . . It appears from what we have already seen that a considerable portion of the New Testament is made up of writings not directly apostolic, and a main problem of criticism is to determine the relation of these writings, especially of the gospels, to apostolic teaching and tradition. . . . . Before this time (the close of the second century) the evidence is less complete. All our knowledge of the period that lies between the apostles and the great teachers of the old Catholic church towards the close of the second century is fragmentary. We possess but scanty remains of the literature, and the same criticism which seeks to bring down many New Testament books into this period questions the genuineness of many of the writings which claim to date from the first half of the second century, and so are appealed to by conservative writers. . . . . The analysis of the New Testament is the resurrection of early parties in the church, each pursuing its own tendency by the aid of literary fiction. . . . . This dubious margin to the canon was of very uncertain limits, and Clement of Alexandria still uses many apocryphal books which found no acknowledgment in other parts of the church. Gradually the list of books which have even a disputed claim to authority is cut down." Again he says: "The original copies of the New Testament writings were probably written on papyrus, and were so soon worn out by frequent use that we do not possess any historical notice of their existence. . . . . To detail all the sources of various readings would be out of place; it may suffice to mention in addition to what has already been said, that glosses, or notes originally written in the margin, very often ended by being taken into the text, and that the custom of reading the scriptures in public worship naturally brought in liturgical additions, such as the doxology of the Lord's Prayer, while the commencement of an ecclesiastical lesson torn from its proper context had often to be supplemented by a few explanatory words, which soon came to be regarded as part of the original."

Comments on the foregoing extracts are hardly necessary, as they confirm many of the claims of less conservative writers, and go to show that the authenticity and reliability of our gospels are of a very uncertain character, and that the chances for changes and corruptions were numerous and great. When all this is taken into consideration with the fact that in the first two centuries there were numerous sects of Christianity, some of whom—the Gnostics—denied the humanity of Christ, insisting that he was only a divine spirit and possessed not a corporeal form at all, while others again denied his divinity, holding that he was only a man, and was not more divine than other human beings, the very great uncertainty and the great want of historical truth is painfully apparent. There are indeed very slight grounds for giving credence to the story which the gospels set forth.

THE FOURTH THESIS.

Here I have nearly reached the close of my letter, and have yet said nothing about our fourth thesis, which reads thus: "The teachings of Jesus are defective in morals, intelligence, and scientific information; and so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles of nature known to be true.

Much is to be said in proof of these positions, but I can say but little in the brief space left of this letter. I will merely remark that much that is attributed to Jesus is beautiful, and his life, as it is presented to us, has many characteristics worthy of admiration. His genial disposition, his usual mildness of character, his fondness for children, his love for his fellow-beings, his desire to impart to them the highest truths he possessed, if truthfully represented, all command our admiration. But there is so much uncertainty about it all that it will not do to let our admiration and credulity have too much rein—they might carry us too far.

When we think how difficult it is, even in this age of advancement, and with all the improvements we possess, to get accurate reports of what is said by the numerous speakers who talk to us, even though the matter is put down within twelve hours from the time when it is spoken, we can realize how improbable it is that the teachings of Jesus were correctly reported when they were not written till three, four, and five generations after the remarks were made. When we now have a good phonographic reporter, and he works with rapidity, he can manage to take down a good share of what a speaker utters, and then at his leisure can write it out in full, and thus the speaker's remarks be pretty fully reported; but eighteen hundred years ago, over there in Judea, they knew nothing about phonographic reporting, and we have no account of any notes of any kind being taken of what Jesus said. The shortest period which Christians claim transpired between the time that Jesus spoke and when his remarks were written out was from thirty to sixty years (while the real facts are that our four gospels were not written till a hundred and fifty years after the time the speeches of Jesus are said to have been delivered, and everybody dead and decomposed who lived at the time). We can judge how difficult it would be for any one to write out a correct report of his many discourses and teachings on various occasions and in various places. If this was deferred for one hundred years, and nobody alive who saw or heard the speaker, the difficulty of getting a correct report would be very greatly increased. The probabilities are that under such circumstances the remarks would be given wholly unlike their utterance, if they were ever uttered, and entirely unworthy of reliance.

But for the sake of the examination of the reported teachings of Jesus we will, for the time being, take the report of his words as being correct, and endeavor to see if there are not some defects in his teachings, as well as imperfections in his conduct. I take the position that his teachings fell short on many occasions of the highest morality, and that his conduct was unworthy a God of infinite power and wisdom.

I will first make a brief review of the teachings of Jesus, as recorded in the New Testament, that we may see how they comport with the common sense and the best idea of morals of our time. It is all I will have space to do now. The beatitudes ascribed to him are in part very good, but in part they appear to me defective, both in morals and good judgment.

1. It cannot be regarded as moral teaching to dissuade men from being industrious, frugal, and provident. The advice to "take no thought for the morrow" is tantamount to telling people not to prepare for winter, not to sow and plant crops, and for the young and middle-aged to lay up nothing for sickness and old age. It was virtually teaching the worst form of thriftlessness and mendicancy; it is just the doctrine that savages, tramps, and beggars act upon, and is the opposite to what would suit an industrious man who prudently looks forward and provides for the coming needs. Those are the most praiseworthy and virtuous who spend their time in doing good to those around them, and are careful to make suitable provision for winter, for sickness, and for old age. Those are the most useless and reprehensible who spend their time in idleness, who neither toil nor spin, and make not the slightest preparation for the wants which are sure to come. The first course is productive of comfort, happiness, and virtue, while the latter will surely lead to want, wretchedness, and crime.

2. A wise and faultless teacher would not instruct people to cut off their right hands and to pluck out their eyes. If an instructor should carry out this practice it would be most foolish and immoral.

3. To pay a premium for theft is far from good morality. The injunction to give the cloak to him who stole the coat just amounts to this. It is a premium for crime.

4. It did not indicate the highest morality or excellence when he said he came not to bring peace, but a sword. Few are so ignorant of goodness as to think war is more productive of virtue than peace.

5. It was not virtue nor morality that prompted him to advise his disciples to sell their garment and buy a sword. Garments are useful to protect the body, but swords are to inflict injury upon others.

6. It is very questionable morality that moved Jesus to command his followers to hate fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and children. Other great teachers had preached love instead of hatred.

7. A truly kind and genial personage would not call a woman a dog when she asked him to do a kindness to her sick child.

8. It is not an indication of superlative excellence and benignity to say, "Those, mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me."

9. It is not the mark of benignity, kindness, and

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Eighth Letter.

CONCLUDED.

Your friends have led you into the grossest error, nor can I imagine a statement that conveys a more erroneous view of the actual state of the case. Says Thomas Hartwell Horne, from whom I observe you make a slight quotation, referring to the fourth century and the catalogue of the New Testament compiled in that century, "we have not fewer than ten distinct catalogues of these books. Six agree exactly with our present canon, namely, the lists of Athanasius (A. D. 315); Epiphanius (A. D. 370); Jerome (A. D. 392); Rufinus (A. D. 390); Augustine, bishop of Hippo in Africa (A. D. 394); and of the forty-four bishops assembled in the third council of Carthage (at which Augustine was present, A.D. 397). Of the other four catalogues, those of Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem (A. D. 340), of the bishops of the council of Laodicea (A.D. 364), and of Gregory, of Nazianzum, bishop of Constantinople (A. D. 375), are the same with our canon, excepting that the Revelation is omitted; and Philaster, or Philastrius, bishop of Brixia or Brescia (A. D. 380), in his list omits the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Revelation, though he acknowledged both of these books in other parts of his works."

I might remark here that the extreme caution of the early church in guarding the genuineness and integrity of the books of the New Testament is shown by the research and tests to which these two books were put until they were undoubtedly proved to be genuine.

Previous to the above-named writers Eusebius, Origen, Gregory, bishop of Neo Cæsarea, Dionisius bishop of Alexandria, Cyprian of Carthage (martyred A. D. 258), all bear the same witness. But surely further quotations would be redundant.

"No one pretends," you say, "that Origen was inspired to discriminate between the false and the true, or that the bishops and priests composing the council of Laodicea were inspired to accept his selection."

No one does, nor is it a fact that the council of Laodicea servilely accepted his selection. But Origen and the Christians before his time and those present at the council of Laodicea, could decide on the fact as to whether these books were written by their accredited authors and determine according to the evidence presented before them without any need for claim to inspiration. And this was all they did. The books themselves were inspired and authoritative from the moment they were first published without the sanction of any human assembly.

Next follows alleged quotations from sources as diverse (and I had almost said as grotesque) as Penn the Quaker, Tindal the martyr, Cooper (I judge an Infidel), and a delightful medley of Luther, Calvin, Erasmus, Evanson, Bauer, Eichhorn, and other Germans, Unitarianism, Swedenborgianism, Catholicism, and Protestantism, the relevancy of which I am unable to comprehend. This I judge is sufficient reason for surrendering it to the reader uncriticised. I might say, though, in reference to your last clause, that I, determined opponent of Catholicism as I am as a system, do not consider the "Catholic" Bible as wholly unreliable, but merely as in some places a wrongly-translated copy of the word of God, and I think my view is the sentiment of Protestantism.

The "ridiculous errors of translation" and "the many and conspicuous additions" do not escape your pen. From the testimony of able scholars it would seem that the substitution of cable for camel in Mark x, 25 would be your ridiculous error. I grant you that here and there a few passages like 1 John v, part of verses 7 and 8, which have crept in, probably from the carelessness of some copyist who copied the words originally put on the margin as an explanatory note. However, it is the testimony of the best Greek and Hebrew scholars that there are but very few such, and they make no alteration in a single doctrine. Nor can such a thing ever be rendered impossible, and it is no more an argument against the divine origin of the Bible than it would be against the genuineness of Demosthenes or Cicero, Bacon or Shakspere, that similar interpolations creep into their texts.

I would not quote Calmet. It suggests the discovery which a Swedish Infidel is said to have made on entering Voltaire's library after the latter's death. There he found a volume by Calmet refuting the prominent objections of Infidelity to Christianity. Against the statements of objections the great French Infidel had drawn lines to make them conspicuous, but he had paid no attention to the reply. It was from this book that the author of the "Philosophical Dictionary" had copied many of his objections to the Bible. I am afraid, sir, that many of the Christian writers you quote from, if you read them at all, it is for a like purpose.

In regard to the good or bad charaeter of the Christian Fathers, I shrink from becoming a mere defender of men. Nor would it be necessary to an unbiased mind in this case, for you have adduced no proof of the evil things you have alleged against the Christians whose names are mentioned in your last letter. Your quotations are second-hand and unworthy of credence, since you give no references whereby they may be tested. I can only say that if any reader accepts such allegations without further proof than an irresponsible ipse dixit they are more credulous than any Christian ever could be.

Still I might ask you if you really believe that Hermas ever boasted to the Lord in prayer that all his life he had lived in dissimulation and hypocrisy? Where is it contained in his works? In what chapter and verse?

You charge that Irenæus was a hypocrite and unworthy of belief because he remarked the analogy between the four gospels and the four winds, the four corners of the earth, the four rivers of Paradise, the four rings of the ark of the covenant, and the four animals described in Ezekiel i, 5–10. I cannot see that this is conclusive proof of your charge, especially since I fully believe that there is a true analogy in the latter. I know that from a mistaken construction of Jno. viii, 57, where the Jews told Christ that he was not yet fifty years of age, Irenæus supposed that the Savior was really that age. I fail, however, to see that this makes him a hypocrite.

You assert that the autographs of the New Testament never were and never could be seen by any one of whom we know. But Tertullian, who was born about A. D. 160, says distinctly that the originals might be seen in his day by any one who would go to the various churches to which they were respectively addressed.

It seems to me a hopeless task to attempt to deny the genuineness of the gospels. Even Infidels on this point cannot agree. The celebrated Lord Bolingbroke considers that "It is out of dispute that we have in our hands the gospels of Matthew and John, who gave themselves out for eye and ear witnesses of all that Christ did and taught. That two channels were as sufficient as four to convey those doctrines to the world, and to preserve them in their original purity. The manner, too, in which these evangelists recorded them was much better adapted to the purpose than that of Plato or even of Xenophon to preserve the doctrines of Socrates" (Bolingbroke's works, vol. iv, p. 390, quoted by Horne).

I need not write further on this topic: it would be merely repetition or elaboration of what was contained in my last letter. To the reader who is desirous of further search, let him read, if he will, the books you have quoted from, Greg, F. W. Newman, and others, but if he is honest he will read the able and exhaustive arguments of Paley, Horne, Lardner, and others after these, who have examined the Infidelity and its arguments of to-day; if he be an honest inquirer I have no fear of the issue. But, which is more conclusive than all, I recommend him to a careful perusal of the Bible, the word of God, which "is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

Awaiting your further remarks on the fourth proposition, I am yours truly, G. M. MAIR.

Psychometry.

The advent of psychometry in the world of science has been very modest and quiet. It is thirty-eight years since I discovered, demonstrated by public and private experiments, and published fully the science and art of psychometry, which, if it is what all its cultivators believe, is destined to lead the van of intellectual progress for many centuries and to revolutionize all progressiv sciences.

Yet no college or university has taken cognizance of this matter as yet. It is presented only in the Eclectic Medical College of this city in my own department, and it would be difficult to learn anything of it from lexicons or cyclopedias, except from Johnson's Cyclopedia, which contains in its supplement a brief, yet clear, statement of the principles of the science.

The reason for all this is that I hav made very little effort for the diffusion of the science beyond occasional lectures and its presentation to medical classes. Every observer of human progress knows that new and marvelous discoveries are resolutely resisted, and require great exertion even to procure them a candid hearing. The principles of psychometry were fully illustrated by myself in Buchanan's Journal of Man over thirty years ago, and by Prof. Denton in his wonderful volumes entitled "The Soul of Things," and I expect to issue a small volume on the subject this year.

Psychometry means etymologically soul-measuring and applies to measuring the powers of the soul by impression, or measuring all things by the impression they make on the soul.

My initial discovery was made in 1841—the discovery that persons of a sensitiv organization could feel and appreciate an impression from anything with which they came in contact; and thus, by holding various substances in the hand, could feel their medical influence upon the constitution and realize it as fully as if they had been swallowed, even recognizing the peculiar taste in the mouth.

In this latitude about one-fourth of the community are capable of realizing such influences in various degrees, and from one-tenth to one-twentieth possess this power to an extent which qualifies them for very interesting experiments and investigations, which have sometimes been applied to the investigation of medicins.

Those who are most highly endowed with these sensibilities and perceptiv powers not only feel medical impressions, but feel every physiological, mental, or pathological impression which proceeds from a human being, and are therefore capable of making exact descriptions of character and constitution, or diagnoses of disease. The most successful physicians everywhere are those who possess this power.

But, what is most remarkable, the impression of mentality, physiological life, or disease, does not require contact with the person. Every piece of writing is charged with that peculiar emanation of the will and the nervous system which conveys to the mind the entire personality of the individual as effectivly as if in contact with himself. This discovery, which I made in the winter of 1842–3, was immediately taught to my classes in New York and Boston, and has become so widely diffused that many physicians giv psychometric descriptions of the diseases of those who write to them and are able to prescribe upon the basis of psychometry as well as if they had seen and examined the patient.

Others who practice psychometry for the description of character respond to any communication sent them, and giv descriptions much more accurate and delicate than any which can be given by phrenological examination of the head. The truth is, the prenology of Gall and Spurzheim is so incomplete a science that its faithful scientific application would frequently lead to error, and the only phrenologists who hav much success are those who possess a fair psychometric capacity, which guards them against the errors of mere cranioscopy and leads them into much more subtle and accurate descriptions.

The power of psychometry as applied to autographs givs us the full command of the character of the absent as well as the present, the dead as well as the living, and reveals the true character and interior motivs of all who hav flourished in history.

Hence it becomes the illuminator of all history and biography, and a fair tribunal for the judgment of living characters, which would enable us to select men for the highest offices, to choose judiciously our own personal associates, and to determin with great certainty the question of guilt or innoceuce which is so often puzzling to a jury from the inadequacy of evidence. A good psychometer could determin in twenty minutes the question of the guilt or innocence of Whittaker, which has so long puzzled the authorities at West Point. A distinguished lawyer writing in the Albany Law Journal of February 5th demands for psychometry a legal recognition as one of the branches of knowledge in which courts may appeal to the testimony of experts. There is no other method in some cases by which to determin the validity of documents in which forgery is suspected but cannot be proved.

The power of psychometry has been known to the most enlightened and progressiv minds ever since its announcement. Bayard Taylor published some remarkable illustrations of this power, and the Rev. Jno. Pierpont, a graceful poet as well as a bold defender of liberty and truth, paid the following tribute to psychometry in his poem on "Progress," delivered at the 150th anniversary of Yale about thirty years ago:

"But much, Daguerre, as has thy genius done
In educating thus Latona's son,
In thus educing in the god of light
The power to paint so at a single sight,
Buchanan has transcended thee as far
As the sun's face outshines the polar star.
Thine art can catch and keep what meets the eye,
His science subjects that far deeper lie.
Thy skill shows up the face, the outward whole,
His science measures and reveals the soul;
Thy subjects must be present, his may be
Sunk in the depth of the mysterious sea.
Their bodies may hav moldered into dust,
Their spirits long hav mingled with the just Made perfect. Yet if one has left behind
A written page whereon the mind
Has been poured out through pencil, paint, or pen,
That written page shall summon back again
The writer's spirit; pressed upon the brow
Or by the hand of many living now,
It shall the writer's character disclose—
His powers, his weaknesses, his joys, his woes,
The manly air, the sycophantic smile,
The patriot's valor and the traitor's wile.
Mysterious science! that has now displayed
'How fearfully and wonderfully made'
Is man, that even his touch can catch the mind
That long has left material things behind!
Fearful the thought that when my clay is cold,
And the next jubilee has o'er it rolled,
The very page that I am tracing now
With tardy fingers and with careworn brow,
To other brows by other fingers pressed

Shall tell the world not what I had been deemed,
Nor what I passed for, nor what I had seemed,
But what I was. Believe it, friends, or not,
To this high point of progress hav we got,
We stamp ourselvs on every page we write!
Send you a note to China or the Pole,
Where'er the wind blows or the waters roll,
That note conveys the measure of your soul!"

For the delineation of character by psychometry in a correct and judicious manner none of my pupils hav attained a higher or more widely diffused reputation than Mrs. C. H. Decker, of this city (205 East 36th street), and your own experiment in giving her the writing of Mr. Ingersoll is a fair specimen of her daily practice. Her descriptions of Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Richmond, Gen. Garfield, and others hav been widely published and admired.

In these remarks I hav not indicated a sufficient basis for my assertion that psychometry will lead the march of progressiv sciences, for I hav spoken only of its application to the investigation of character and the diagnosis of disease, in which it relieves the practice of medicin of a great amount of uncertainty and error by its accurate diagnoses. These are but a small portion of its capacities as an aid to scientific investigation, which are so great, so numerous, and so marvelous that I prefer to postpone their statement to the publication of a volume on the subject.

JOSEPH RODES BUCHANAN.

PSYCHOMETRIC DISCRIPTION OF ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Tuesday, March 30, 1881, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER placed in the hands of the famous psychometer, Mrs. C. H. Decker, of 205 East 36th street, New York, a sheet of manuscript written by Robert G. Ingersoll, portion of a friendly letter addressed by him to Mrs. Bennett at the time of her husband's imprisonment.

Mrs. Decker did not look at writing, nor had she the slightest information as to its source. In properly-conducted psychometric experiments the psychometer is not allowed to hav any idea of the source of the writing, and Mrs. Decker prefers not to receive any information as to the writer or the subject matter, nor even to see the appearance of the writing, lest it might unconsciously influence her opinions, which are derived entirely from the sympathetic impression received through the sense of touch and transmitted to the mind. Mrs. Decker has been publicly known for more than a year as a psychometer, and receives many letters from a distance inclosing writings for a psychometric opinion, and her descriptions excite so much interest that she is kept busy through the day in answering letters, and is generally too much fatigued in the evening to prolong her labors, to which however she made an exception in this instance.

Sitting in her parlor with a dim light, she held the writing in silence for one or two minutes, and then spoke as follows:

"I feel a wonderful brain power—very great power of perception—the great brain is used constantly. There is very great activity, strong individuality, singularly individual.

"The power of thought in this brain takes such hold of mine that I seem too confused to giv full expression as I wish. It seems like a thousand wheels and engins flashing through my brain.

"I should judge this to be a gentleman, a thinker, an originator. I don't believe this mind was ever guilty of borrowing an idea. He is thoroughly original. He has great ambition, great penetration. I feel as though I wished to go down to the depths of things and fathom all realms of knowledge.

"There is no power that can satisfy the cravings of this brain. It seems like a capacious reservoir, taking in constantly without ever being filled or satisfied. I feel very strangely. I never had such sensations in my brain as from this. I can hardly find fitting words to express my feelings and fully describe the character.

"There is a great deal of identity or individuality in this. Whether the subject has called out this intensity of feeling or it is the natural state of the mind I do not perceive at this moment.

"He is a leader, and a great champion of any cause he may espouse. He is fearless. I want to reach out my hand to you, Mr. Bennett, extending the hand of brotherly affection or joining hands with you in an affectional way."

The letter expresses great sympathy for Mr. and Mrs. Bennett.

"He has done more than dozens of men who hav preceded him. I consider this man a bold defender of the weak and a humanitarian in his purposes, with a strong, very strong, will. He never lets anything stand in his way if it is possible for human power to carry out his purpose. He has great controling ability. It seems to me he has fought the angry waves of opposition a great portion of his life, but he rather likes it. He likes opposition. I think he courts it. It stimulates him to action.

"I feel as to his pursuits in life that all the tendencies are toward the literary field of labor. He has a massiv intellect. He shows it by teaching, by action, and by maturing his plans. He never works except for a principle. He is industrious. I get an impression of journalism, but not as an editor. He has not settled down to the real work his nature is designed for. His soul is engaged in solving problems involving ideas. I know no person better calculated to meet discouragements, he bears them so well."

Question.—How would he do in the ministry?

"He would hav to be a reformer. He could not liv in an environment of a orthodox religion. If in that profession he'd graduate readily to Liberalism."

Question.—How would he do as a politician?

"I would like to see him President. He has true administrativ ability. He would not connive or intrigue with the fraudulent. He is very agreeable. He has a wonderful fund of agreeableness, suavity of manner."

Question.—How would he do as a lawyer?

"He would make a splendid advocate. He has great magnetic power which he carries in his speech. He is very technical in law matters, is very adroit in drawing out a witness, very astute. He is very humane, a man of very fine sensibilities; with all his firmness, a little thing touches him. He has a very large soul. He has no arrogance. He does not lift himself up and out of the current of the sympathies of mankind, but affiliates with the people. He is not altogether satisfied with the past or the present. He feels so much he could hav done that he ought. Strange to say, he depends much on the sympathies of his friends. He may not realize it. He loves encouragement from his friends. His opponents bring out another quality."

Question.—What is his style of oratory?

"He has a commanding manner in speaking, seems unstudied, uses fine language, is not verbose, but covers well the ground of his subject and clothes his ideas in a few well-selected words, so that you get all he would say and retain it because it is bereft of all superfluous verbiage. He is quite sarcastic, and if the subject required, could throw in a great deal of wit and sarcasm. His themes would be of a deep or grave character. He has a very clear and comprehensiv idea of the ridiculous side of things, and relates an anecdote or incident with great effect. He likes the two extremes, the grave and the ludicrous. In speaking he carries the mind of his hearers along with him, and does not fatigue his hearers nor himself. He has a wonderful power of endurance.

"I don't think he cares much to build up a fortune for himself. He's not concerned about that. His own individual needs don't seem to impress him with much force. He seems more ambitious for public good than fortune for himself. He is not avaricious for money. It seems to me his ambition is to revolutionize systems, certain systems, and become an actor in scenes of progress."

Question.—What is his religion?

"He does not believe in orthodoxy. He has a religion of his own. He believes in deity. He believes in the ultimate happiness of mankind. I don't really know whether he believes in a future existence or not. He's thinking on that subject. He may talk and promulgate certain views, but his religion is nature. He worships God through nature, and trusts to the future to reveal anything like a hereafter of life. I don't think he does believe much in a hereafter. He is a thoroughly good man, and his chances for heaven are equal to the best."

Question.—Whom could it be?

"I hav never seen this man, but he seems more like what I hav read of Ingersoll than any one else."

Ways and Means.

In January last I issued a circular appeal to some seven hundred reputed "wealthy Liberals" whose names had been sent me by readers of the Liberal papers. The "appeal" called for liberal aid to the National League. The same circular was also sent to all the auxiliary Leagues. It has recently been published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. Just previous to sending out the appeal I had prepared an article on life and annual memberships in the League, which also was published in the Liberal papers. That article and the appeal resulted in a very encouraging revival of life and annual memberships, and in some Liberal contributions to the League treasury without reference to membership. The following is a statement of the amounts received up to March 20th, before the publishing of the appeal in the Liberal papers:

H. L. R. Jones, Osage Mission, Kan	$1 00

In the above list it will be observed that a few auxiliary Leagues responded liberally to the appeal. A few others promised even more liberally, but hav not yet performed. The great majority either sent excuses or said nothing. I hav piped, but they hav not danced. What more can I do?

The above amount is a long way short of the sum that my appeal pointed out could be raised, but it is a beginning. Looked at as a beginning, if it will keep on, it is encouraging; and it must keep on if Liberalism is ever to amount to anything more than a scatteration and a squad in this country.

The auxiliary Leagues do not seem to understand their relation to the National League. They seem to think if they meet regularly, go through all their exercises, badger the churches, and exert a Liberal influence in their own town, they hav done their whole League duty. But all this they could do without affiliation with a national body. The object of that affiliation is mutual support, the interchange of good offices and influences, the formation of alliances, the enlistment of local strength to increase the national force, and the reaction of the national force to giv power and prestige to the local society. When the auxiliary givs $5 to the National League, it does not giv something for nothing. It purchases the help aud health and strength of all the other auxiliaries. The local League can do little more than the local individual can in a state or national way. To effect state and national purposes the local Leagues must join state and national bodies, and must expect to pay their proportion of the expenses of state and national organizations.

Mr. Graff, secretary of the League at Baltimore, made a suggestion in the last League Man that each auxiliary League should pay the National League a monthly tax, say of five or ten cents upon each of its members. It may hav to come to that, and the League be compelled to recognize as auxiliaries affiliated with it only those local societies who contribute something to enable the National League to forward its national work. The officers of these headquarters are the executiv hands of the auxiliaries. They must furnish us the tools for our work. They are organized and united with us at this head center for a common purpose, and we are here to carry out that purpose. We are the snapper end of the lash, but they must put in the snap, and it is for them to say how they best can do it. Organization is an almost entirely new thing for those who are contending for universal mental liberty, and we hav to experiment as we go along. After trying one plan and finding it can be improved, let us amend it—or if it won't do at all, let's drop it altogether.

I am able to report two new Leagues in Illinois, organized by our indefatigable chairman of the Executiv Committee for that state, F. F. Follett. One is a state League which he has been long agitating and working up. He has it now in a sufficiently forward state to apply for a charter, which I hav sent him (No. 161). In course of the spring he will call a state convention to complete the organization. The National Liberal League Constitution contemplates and provides for such state organizations, and they now exist in three states—Iowa, Kansas, and Illinois. What state next will join this growing column? Michigan is Liberal and has Leagues enough; so are Wisconsin and California.

The other League got up by Mr. Follett, is at Nashville, Ill. (No. 213), Robt. Guthrie, President. All the vacant numbers caused by the withdrawal or dissolution of disaffected Leagues, hav now been filled up by the joining of new Leagues. No. 213 is a gain of one on the list, as it stood at the last Congress at Chicago. Having repaired damages we can now go forward and roll up the original column.

One annual member, Mr. John R. Kelso, of Modesto, Cal., and one life member, Mr. R. L. Baker, of Fort Fairfield, Me., hav joined our forces since last report. They are included in the above.

Does America Sympathize with Russia?

BRO. BENNETT: Did Blaine express the sentiment of the American people when he cabled to St. Petersburg "profound sympathy with the imperial family and Russian people in their great affliction?" He may have spoken for the Republican party; quite likely he did; but no officer of the republic has any right to speak officially in that manner of the "imperial family," or to assume that the people of a republic whose foundations were laid in the blood of the minions of kings for one moment think that the people of Russia hav suffered an "affliction" in the timely taking off a most odious tyrant. The Russian empire is a despotism, remorselessly crushing everything that has the semblance of religious or political liberty. And our papers talk of "his majesty, the emperor!" Such lickspittles don't deserve liberty. E. C. WALKER.

love to send souls to everlasting flames because they could not believe what they were told they must believe. "Believe or be damned" has been the authority for all the persecution and killing for not believing right that the church practiced for centuries.

10. It was not especially truthful in him to promise his disciples that they should sit on twelve thrones over the children of Israel. It remains unfulfilled.

11. It was hardly kindness that prompted him to curse whole cities because they would not receive his disciples.

12. It was more immoral than moral to instruct his disciples to take the ass belonging to another without consent.

13. It would not be considered just the proper thing now for a man to take a lot of his followers with him through a neighbor's cornfield on Sunday and pluck the corn that belonged to another.

14. It was an exhibition of ignorance, impatience, and foolish anger to expect to find figs on a tree in the winter, and, when disappointed, to angrily curse the tree and kill it.

15. He did not forgive the woman who was caught in the act of adultery upon the highest moral ground—"Let him that is without sin cast the first stone."

16. It was the spirit of severity that moved him to say, "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my father which is in heaven." A spirit of revenge is here to be seen.

17. It was not good manners nor gentlemanly conduct when he had accepted an invitation to dine with a man, and, when spoken to for not following the Jewish custom of washing the hands before eating, to call the host a fool, a hypocrite, etc.

18. It was not nice in him to denounce people as fools, hypocrites, blind guides, devourers of widows' houses, serpents, vipers, children of hell, etc.

19. It was not mild, gentle, just, nor lamb-like in a furious manner to upset the tables of the money-changers, who were following a life-long custom by selling doves, etc., in the temple to those who wished to perform the rite of sacrifice, and then rudely beating and flogging them with thongs and ropes' ends and rudely driving them out of the temple, where they had as much right as himself.

20. It was not truthful to declare that the end of the world should come, and he be seen in glory in the heavens before that generation should pass away, and before some of those present had tasted death. That prediction was a falsehood.

21. He did not utter the truth when he said those who believed on him should be able to take up poisonous serpents and drink any deadly thing without harm. Can you who believe in him so strongly do this?

22. In hundreds of thousands of cases the believers in Jesus have laid their hands upon the sick without being able to cure them, though he promised they should be able to do so.

23. It is not correct to give the highest credit to believing when it is not a matter of choice. No one can believe unless his reason is convinced, and then he cannot help it.

24. It was not the highest wisdom to promise frail, fallible man that he should hold the keys of heaven, and that whomsoever he bound on earth should be bound in heaven, and whomsoever he loosed on earth should be loosed in heaven.

25. He did not speak truly when he promised his followers that whatever they asked for, believing, they should receive. This has been falsified in millions of instances.

26. It was not merciful to condemn to endless punishment those who should refuse to assist believers or be unrepentant at his coming.

27. He did not agree with modern science and experience to pretend to cast devils out of those who were afflicted with physical and mental diseases.

28. It was not just in him to place divorce on the ground of fornication only, when there are other reasons equally legitimate.

29. He did not give a clear and truthful reason why taxes or tribute should be paid, when it was because Cæsar's image was on the coin, saying, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

30. It was not a mark of divine prescience and wisdom to choose a man for a personal attendant and trusted companion who should conspire with enemies and cause his death.

31. He did not open his mouth against human slavery and oppression.

32. He made no effort to destroy priestcraft or kingcraft.

33. It was not discouraging the vices of men nor promoting temperance and virtue to make wine for men already drunk.

34. It was not a mark of wisdom to impart his lessons in such enigmatical and obscure language that he could not be understood. Puzzling and misleading in place of instructing exhibits a degree of unfairness and dishonesty.

35. This is not the soundest wisdom, bravery, of morals, "Agree with thine adversary quickly (or thy legal opponent), lest he prosecute thee and cast thee into prison." It smacks strongly of cowardice, a yielding to wrong for policy's sake. Did a God really need to come down from heaven to teach such morality?

36. The command to fallible mortals to be as perfect as their Father in heaven is perfect, shoots as much too high as other precepts were too low. It is not sensible or moral to command impossibilities.

37. It was not an indication of superior excellence for Jesus to insult his mother before strangers by saying, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?"

38. It was questionable wisdom that prompted him to command to give alms secretly only. The example of good deeds is always beneficial to the beholder.

39. It was a time-serving, cowardly policy to command abstaining from judging to avoid being judged, and to do good to win the benefits that would result. It was like all his temporizing policy. The Stoics taught a higher system of morality.

40. It is not the highest incentive to good deeds to ever hold up the reward to follow. Virtuous and good actions should be performed because they are right.

41. Lilies and birds are not the highest models to be held up for men to pattern after. It is more like pandering to indolence and thriftlessness.

42. It is of doubtful propriety and wisdom to ever be holding up the remuneration in a life to come for conduct performed here, instead of the consequences and effects in this life. To direct attention to the laws of this life seems more wise than to be always ignoring them and directing the attention to something which cannot be seen or known.

43. It was untruthful to represent that if his disciples would say to a mountain, "Remove to yonder place," it should be removed. It was most delusive. Belief has of itself never removed a pound of earth.

44. It was pernicious teaching to promise his followers anything impracticable and impossible. To assure them that the Supreme Being would bestow upon them any and every thing they should ask for in his name was false and misleading. This promise has proved untrue millions of times.

45. It was idle and untruthful to pretend that his disciples could cure diseases and cast out devils by fasting. If the patient should do the fasting it would be far more efficacious.

46. It was not truthful to hold up that poverty is necessarily virtuous and wealth necessarily immoral and deserving of hell.

47. It was hardly fair and honorable in Jesus to denounce the devil as a liar, the father of liars, and a murderer, without pointing out a single lie he had told or a single murder he had committed.

48. It was not a mark of bravery becoming a god to tremble at the prospect of arrest, to implore that the cup might pass by him, and to sweat great drops of blood in his state of mental agony, when it was all the very thing he had come on earth to perform. It looks like unmanliness.

49. It was not truthful in him to promise the thief on the cross that he should be with him that day in paradise, when he was under contract to go to hell and stay there three days.

50. Jesus did not show fortitude and courage in the hour of death. He cried out in his desperation, and he seemed greatly unreconciled to the part he had to perform in that mournful drama, and he accused his father with having forsaken him. Thousands of pagans have met death far more bravely. Socrates is a case in point; he placidly drank the poisoned cup when commanded to do so, and laid bravely down and died like a man and hero, without expressing the least cowardliness or irresolution.

Many other instances of the defective teachings and actions of Jesus might be pointed out, but these will answer our present purpose. One thing must be apparent; if he was the God of infinite wisdom and power, he took a singular way to manifest it. He might have done a great deal for the needy human race which he made no attempt to do. He taught nothing new; he brought to light no new scientific or philosophical fact; he seemed to have a very limited knowledge of the laws of nature; he introduced no beneficial invention; he taught no practical knowledge, perhaps because his own was deficient. If he could read and write it does not appear in the story, and that there were many defects in his character and teaching is not to be disputed. His short life seems to have been spent in repeating platitudes and moral maxims which had been taught by teachers before him.

It is admitted by all Bible scholars that Paul's epistles were written before the gospels, and it is singular that Paul, who often speaks of the life and crucifixion of Jesus, never alludes to his teachings, maxims, and precepts.

That older teachers and sages taught as wisely, morals as pure and perfect as those of Jesus, I will endeavor to show in my next.

Very truly yours, D. M. B.

Parton's Life of Voltaire. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

We learn from Boston that the life of Voltaire by James Parton has been in type for a week or two past and may be expected to appear early in May. Considerable orders having been received from England, the publishers, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., have taken measures to secure a copyright in that country under recent rulings of British courts. The work will be in two volumes, octavo, of about 640 pages each, with portraits and other illustrations. Of all the men who hav contended for the rights of the human mind, Voltaire made the largest, the most skilful and most triumphant fight. He was one man against a most powerful combination of despot and priest. For sixty years he was the foremost of literary personages living, and used his talents for no object that was not noble and humane. His faults were those of the age in which he lived; his virtues were his own. Mr. Parton's work, the result of many years of steady and devoted labor, will, we believe, exhibit him in his true character, as the loyal and brilliantly gifted servant of truth and man.

Why I Do Not Believe. By Augustus Jacobson. Chicago: Belford, Clarke & Co.

We hav space for but a mere outline of this work. The author goes right into his subject without circumlocution. "Why I Do Not Believe" is written "to show the uncertainty 'of the things wherein' we hav been instructed;" and the uncertainty and unreliability of the Bible are plainly and tersely set forth. The author does not claim originality in his views; they are the opinions of the best philosophers and most learned scholars put into the language of plain people. Starting with the invitation of Paul to "come now and let us reason together," he goes on to giv his reasons why he is not a Christian. He tears the Pentateuch to pieces, and the New Testament fares badly at his hands. He shows Paul to hav been the real author of Christianity, and not Christ; that the gospels were not written by the original disciples of Jesus; that it is not the miracles that make the believers, but the believers who make the miracles, and that miracles and witches are impossible without blind faith. The teachings of Jesus are shown to be either plagiarisms or written after his death to fit his assumed character of messiah. The book contains many unanswerable arguments, and will be read with profit by all. Price, $1.25. Sold at this office.

Bible Inquirer; or, a key to Bible Investigation. Containing 148 propositions with references to the most plain and striking self-contradictions of the so-called inspired scriptures. Also 152 references to most marvelous occurrences. By A. Jacobson, Omaha, Neb.

This is a useful pamphlet, and is a regular index to the Bible so far as the passages indicated are concerned. It will prove a decided help to those who wish to "search the scriptures." Sold at this office. Price, 15 cents.

The Diet Cure. The Relations of Food and Drink to Health, Disease, and Cure. By T. L. Nichols, M.D., editor of the London Herald of Health. M. L. Holbrook & Co., New York.

The twenty-four chapters in this little book treat upon health, food, water, blood, the natural food of man, disease, prevention and cure; the question of quantity, the question of quality, principles of the diet cure, medical opinions on the diet cure; of diet in acute, scrofulous, and nervous diseases; the diet cure in obesity; vis medicatrix naturæ; the diet cure in various diseases; the water cure; waste of life; the life of the race; the population question, some practical illustrations; air and exercise; of psychic force; national health and wealth; personal advice.

The sensible method of treating and curing disease by diet instead of by the use of drugs is here given by an able writer, who thoroughly understands his business.

Bound in cloth. Price, 50 cents.

The Reign of Monopoly. By T. A. Bland, author of "Farming as a Profession," "Life of Benjamin F. Butler," etc. Washington: Rufus H. Darby.

The ten chapters are: 1. Origin and Nature of Monopoly, Despotism and Republicanism in Conflict, the American Banking System; 2. Land and Monopoly; 3. How Railroads are Built; 4. How Railroads should be Built; 5. How Gas Companies and Street Car Corporations Rob the People; 6. Cornering the Market; 7. The License Monopoly Considered and Condemned; 8. The Despotism of Professional Rings; 9. A Regular-Army Aristocracy; 10. Monopoly of Political Rights. The author treats these subjects in a clear, forcible manner. He fails not to convince the reader of the correctness of his views. Price, 25 cents. Sold at this office.

How we Fed the Baby to Make her Healthy and Happy: with Health Hints. By C. E. Page, M.D. 144 pages. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Fowler & Wells, New York.

This little work is designed as an aid to mothers in getting over with the management of the little ones through the important period of infancy, and help in the avoidance of many of the ills to which they are liable. It appears to be a very useful little work. The babes soon become grown people and take the place or those passing away, and their good management is of the highest importance.

English Tyranny and Irish Suffering. Dedicated to the Irish Land League of Memphis, Tenn. By Avery Merriwether, Esq., of that city.

This pamphlet of twenty-seven pages takes decided ground against despotism and oppression and in favor of Irish liberty. It is timely and ably written, and will repay perusal. Its closing words are, "A people must hav the right to rule themselvs as they wish—it matters not whether that people liv in a country called Ireland or Poland or Saxony or the Southern States of America.

An Inner View of the State Lunatic Asylum at Utica; or, How the Patients are Treated in the Model (?) Mad-house of New York. By Wm. L. Trull, an ex-patient. Published at Cohoes, N. Y.

This is a pamphlet of fifty-six pages, and givs rather an interesting account of seventeen days spent in the Insane Asylum at Taunton, Mass, and several months in the State Asylum, at Utica, N. Y. Many cases of cruelty and mistreatment are given. The insane are doubtless often treated with unnecessary harshness and cruelty.

Reforms Proposed in the Methods of Civil Practice and Procedure in the Courts of Illinois. Designed to Introduce greater Dispatch, Integrity, Skill, and Economy into the Administration of Civil Justice, and to Increase the Efficiency of the Courts and the Utility of the Bar, as Aids to the Business of the People. By Prof. Van Buren Denslow, LL.D. Victor F. Lawson & Co., Chicago.

Prof. Denslow is one of the clearest and ablest writers of our age, and those interested in needed law reform cannot help being interested in what he says in this little pamphlet.

Christianity from a Historical and Scientific Standpoint. By Wm. N. McLaren, attorney at law. Kansas City: Ramsey, Millett & Hudson.

This is an able and candid examination of the subject.

Price, 50 cents. Sold at this office.

Marriage, Paternity, and Home. Not "Cupid Yokes," but "Cupid's Shield." By Dr. A. B. Spinney, Detroit, Mich. 29 pages. Price, 25 cents.

This lecture of the genial doctor is an argument in favor of home and the purity of married life and against unbridled passion and lust. It contains many excellent suggestions, and should hav a wide reading.

The Relation of the Spiritual to the Magnetic Universe; The Law of Control. Two papers in the interest of spiritual science, and purporting to be at the dictation of the late Prof. M. Faraday, of England. Star Publishing Company, Springfield, Mass. Price, 10 cents.

These discussions on matter, spirit, organization, and life from a Spiritualistic point of view will interest many of our readers. The 24 pages contain a good deal for the money.

The Indications of Character, as Manifested in the General Shape of the Head and the Form of the Face. Illustrated. By H. S. Drayton, author of "Light in Dark Places," "Brain and Mind," etc. Fowler & Wells, New York.

This pamphlet of 48 pages givs a clear and intelligent description of character and talents to be judged of by the general contour of the head and face. It is very convenient for those who do not wish to incur the expense of larger works. Price, 15 cents.

How to Make the Poor Richer and the Rich Poorer, and bring the good time here, when it shall not be that the harder a man's hands are from producing the comforts of life the less likely he is to hav any of them around him. An essay by C. Orchardson, 208 East Ohio street, Chicago, Ill., and Spring Lake, Mich.

This pamphlet of 31 pages, is an earnest plea in favor of the toiling classes, and exposes the tyranny of capitalists, heavy merchants, and manufacturers. It discriminates against the rich and in favor of the poor, for the oppressed and against the oppressor.

Voting not Representation; A Demand for Definit Democracy and Political Evolution. By Alfred Cridge, San Francisco, Cal.

This pamphlet of 32 pages presents a radical view of that which pertains to the political institution of our country. The author has given much thought to the subject and presents his arguments in a strong, clear light.

We hav gotten up a neat catalog of sixty-four pages of our own publications, of English and American radical works, health and medical books, and a large list of miscellaneous works which we offer for sale. Those wishing a full catalog will please send for a copy. Sent free.

Mrs. H. S. Lake begins a course of lectures for the Robert Burns Liberal League at Assembly Buildings, corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets, Sunday evening, April 24th. Her address is 1441 North Eighth street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The "Mirror of Progress."

We hav omitted to mention the change of editor and publisher of this sprightly Liberal paper of Kansas City, and the return to its original name. It is now edited and published by Mrs. Judge Kukel (formerly Miss Mattie Hulett Parry) and Mr. David Eccles. The change is a good one. The management is now very able, and the paper in talent is behind no Liberal paper in the country. May success and prosperity attend it for many years to come.

Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, having made a change in their Eastern program, will receive calls to lecture week evenings or to attend funerals at 123 West Eagle street, Buffalo, New York, where they are engaged by that champion of free thought, speech, and press, A. H. Frank, during the month of June, after which they will make their contemplated visit to New York and Boston.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll has for the past two weeks been lecturing in New England. On Sunday evening, the 24th, he is announced to deliver his new lecture, "Some Reasons Why," at Booth's Theater in this city. Of course the large house will be well packed.

Be it known to those who are at all interested in the matter that Anthony Comstock utterly failed in his attempt to gain admittance into the Masonic fraternity. When the matter was recently brought to a test he was effectually blackballed. That body clearly did not want a man with such a character as his to become one of them. For this they are entitled to the respect of the world.

The Eleventh Annual Convention of the American Labor Reform League meets in Science Hall, 141 Eighth street, New York, Sunday and Monday, May 1st and 2d. Three sessions daily. J. K. Ingalls, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Dr. C. S. Weeks, R. W. Hume, Wm. Rowe, H. B. Brown, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

W. F. Jamieson is engaged in giving his fourth course of lectures at Mauston, Wis. April 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th he gave a course of lectures at Salem, Ill. Address accordingly.

Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox, who has been speaking acceptably to an independent Liberal congregation at Moberly, Mo., has now accepted a call to Ottumwa, Iowa, where she will speak every Sunday. She will make engagements to lecture for Spiritualists and Liberalists week-day evenings. Address her, Ottumwa, Iowa.

The Tenth Annual Convention of the American Anti-Usury Society meets in Science Hall, N.Y., Monday, May 2d, at 10 A. M. Edward Palmer, Messrs. Howe, Ingalls, Heywood, Dr. Weeks, and others will speak.

Married.—April 4, 1881, at Piedra, Colorado, Mr. J. Allen Evans to Miss R. W. Little, formerly of New Albany, Ind. May happiness attend this couple through a lifetime of many happy years.

We hav several letters for Evangeline, but hav lost the address. Will Evangeline tell us where to send them?

Louisville Liberals—Proposal to Inject a little Life into Them.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Louisville has 150,000 people, but not one flourishing Liberal society. As to Liberalism the place is as dead as Rome. There seems to be no unity nor any desire among a sufficient number to keep up any interest. With a view to seeing what can be done, I hav rented Banquet Hall, on Jefferson street, south side, near Third, and will commence a course of free lectures there on the 24th day of April, at 7:30 P.M. Please publish this, and urge the Liberals to attend. If I am afforded any kind of support the lectures will be continued as long as I hav strength, and I will try and make it the means of bringing other lecturers to Louisville.

Obituary.

Died at Benton, Arkansas, on the 19th of February, 1881, Mrs Olivia M. Carter, daughter of Francis Sheldon. Judge S. N. Elliott spoke at her funeral in a feeling manner, partly as follows:

Mrs. Olivia M. Carter was born in the state of Michigan on the 10th day of September, 1840. Her father immigrated in 1845, and settled in the state of Iowa, where she was married in March, 1862, from which place she accompanied her husband to the state of Oregon. At that time a journey across the plains was attended with many hazards because of hostil Indians; but she was possessed of fortitude adequate to the occasion. For weeks and months did they travel the tiresome plains, clamber rugged mountains and scale their snow-capped summits, during which the deceased was ever cheerful, hopeful, and confident, her eyes always to the front. Thus was she a strength to her husband. They remained in Oregon eight years, and to them was born three children, when Mr. Carter and family returned and settled in Joplin, Missouri, where was born their youngest child.

Though the deceased has been with us but a short time, she was endeared to all in the circle of her acquaintance; disingenuous, cheerful, intellectual, and warm-hearted, whom to know was to love.

With a clear conception of the duties incident to the various relations of life, she moved straightforward to their discharge, nor did she neglect them in idle quest of the beginnings of time and matter, or traveling to the verge of space, nor curious to reach her tiny hand to draw aside the impenetrable veil of the future. Recognizing the fact that the human mind in its powers are finite, she grappled not with infinitudes, and said,

> "Know thyself; presume not God to scan;
> The proper study of mankind is man."

She believed that virtue was and is the handmaid of intelligence, that the moral and intellectual kept apace, that ignorance led to the infraction of law, that violated law was sin, and that misery and woe were consequences which unavoidably followed. She believed the same destiny awaited the whole human family, and hence her love was co-extensiv with her race.

When alive, home was her heaven, where is erected in the love of her family a monument enduring as life. The good of life endureth all along the ages of time.

Our sister died serenely and without fear, her last words being, "My son, be a good boy; mamma must now die."

A Friendly Notice.

An Infidel Abroad. By D. M. Bennett, editor of The Truth Seeker. New York: Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, 141 Eighth street.

We hav already in these columns made our readers acquainted with the noble struggle for freedom of publication that was made in America by Mr. D. M. Bennett, and which resulted in a severe term of imprisonment for that gentleman. After being released from Albany Penitentiary, Mr. Bennett was sent by a large number of American Freethinkers as their delegate to the Brussels Conference. By this means a ten weeks' tour in Europe was made possible, and Mr. Bennett made up for his enforced retirement by a general ramble over Europe. As the editor of The Truth Seeker it was but natural that he should think of his paper, and write letters for publication in its pages. This he did, pretty voluminously, and the series of letters are now reprinted in a large volume, under the title given above.

In noticing this book, we do not intend to place upon record a mere "puff." While we cordially admit the very great interest that its pages contain, we are in duty bound to take heed of the serious faults which, as a matter of fact, are due to the want of that revision which, as the author states in his preface, he was unable to giv to the letters when made up into a permanent form. These, however, are mere matters of detail, concerning the spelling of words and proper sequences of sentences.

A plain American citizen, he views European matters in a light that cannot fail to interest. Thus we continually find a happy criticism, a genial remark, or a good-humored joke on things that association has caused us to estimate at more than their proper value. If it be an advantage to see ourselvs as others see us, we should wish to hav the advantage of Mr. Bennett's observation as recorded in this book.

"An Infidel Abroad" is, in parts, very amusing, more especially where, at Rome, the traveler found himself under the necessity of negotiating the hiring of some apartments, without being able to speak a word of Italian, while the other high-contracting party, of course, could not speak a word of English. The writer's account of this delectable interview is colored with the racy humor of the Yankee.

Freethinkers will find much to interest them in the accounts given by Mr. Bennett of his experiences at the Brussels Congress, and at London, when a testimonial was presented to him by the National Secular Society. Mr. Bennett appears to have been deeply touched by the sympathy and friendliness exhibited toward him by the Secularists of this country. "It filled me," he writes, "with the deepest sense of gratitude that such excellent friends had so kindly recognized me, heartily extending to me the right hand of fellowship."

The thick volume of 850 pages has not, of course, been adequately reviewed in the brief space at our disposal. But we have endeavored to indicate its merits as well as its defects, and can only express our hearty satisfaction at being able to renew, through the medium of this book, our friendly intercourse with the author.

Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Thinking a brief report of the Thirty-third Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism might be of interest to some of your readers, I send the following:

Exercises were held in Weisgerber's Hall, which is a neat, cheerful, and pleasing room, good size, tastefully frescoed, walls hung with charts, appropriate mottoes, and engravings.

Address of welcome, by Thomas Lees, was apropos. He spoke of the pleasing reminiscences of former anniversaries of the "Rochester rappings" from the time of the first anniversary down to the present; augured the present one would be no exception in interest and results; that many who had formerly been present had gone North, South, East, and West, while others had gone where "the dead liv on, never more to die." Were he clairvoyantly gifted, doubtless he could see present the faces of those whom we mourn as absent. Paid tribute to James Lawrence, through whose mediumship the wish was first expressed to hold anniversary exercises commemorativ of the "raps," and hoped "unity and diversity" would be the motto; made special mention of the medical law now pending in the Ohio Legislature, entitled "An act to prevent the irregular practice of medicin and surgery within the state," as this law is aimed as a death-blow to healing mediums.

Then followed remarks by Dr. Underhill, of Akron, Ohio, and others whose names we failed to learn.

In the afternoon E. B. Williams, Esq., of Fremont, O., favored, with an eloquent and able address upon the live issues of Spiritualism. Would that your space allowed its entire presentation! Will only note a few of the salient points. He said, "In looking over the audience, I see but few familiar faces, yet there comes back a warmth of feeling, a glow of friendship, a feeling of soul touching soul peculiar to these meetings, that warms the icy formality between strangers into warm and sympathetic bonds of friendship." He contrasted this strife-allaying atmosphere, these truth-loving people, with the fogs and bruises in the buffets and tosses of the great masses of human icebergs on the restless Arctics of existence.

Leaving the harmonies of the religion he passed to the practical, noted how the rank and file of Spiritualism are fast filling up and its establishment assured, time only being required to seat it permanently mistress on the throne of reason; indicated existing conditions demanding reform, the necessity for change in our institutions that are responsible for these conditions, the needy poor, the languishing sick, outcast girls, the rejected and scorned prisons, asylums, and poorhouses. Reforms are needed in these conditions and institutions. Custom has rendered us well-nigh dumb and unfeeling. It shows how derision, ostracism, and vituperation impel to silence, although conscious of appalling wrongs. Occasionally a Henry C. Wright, a William Lloyd Garrison, a Parker Pillsbury, an Annie Besant, or a Thomas Paine emerges from the level of submission and with no uncertain meaning attacks these evils that are fettering human progress. Nor should we allow threatened sentences of shallow society to deter; that whatever we get that is ours to keep we must earn. What a splendid thing when everybody is busied with useful occupation! Among the means of reform, fill offices with good men, honest and capable, who have the brain and the will to do what is asked of them, men who will rise above party and work for humanity. In electing legislatures, instead of politicians in whom the last spark of truth and honor has long since been smothered out, select men whose views are large and practical, who know what the wants of the people are, and hav the courage to introduce, help sustain, and pass measures adapted for the general good. Legislation for the obscure mechanic, laborer, and tiller of the soil is most needed to lessen crime by decreasing necessities tending to the production thereof, as also enact laws to restrain the rich and protect the poor, and to break party lines and support the fittest person. He spoke of the mockery of capital punishment and said the very poorest use you can possibly put a man to is to kill him. Infamous law! Wipe it out! Cultivate purity as revealed through nature, and discard the false standard shallow society inculcates.

At the conclusion of Mr. Williams's address, Messrs. Moses Hull, of Boston, and Hudson Tuttle, of Berlin Hights, addressed the audience briefly, the former concurring with Mr. Williams as to these reform measures being the labor of the Spiritualist, the latter inclining more to the dissemination of the harmonial philosophy and phenomena.

In the evening followed the grand Lyceum exhibition, which was a great success, the fine program being excellently rendered and the music especially pleasing.

Thursday morning Hudson Tuttle, the writer, delivered the anniversary address, which was chock full of choice thoughts. It was not oratorical, but still greatly interesting. In substance he said: Spiritualism is old as humanity, but, as the time, has developed fitted conditions. Thirty-three years ago the Spiritualists laid their cables, established rapport between the invisible and tangible worlds, and they will retire at the bidding of no one. They hav come to stay. The advent was ushered in and gained the public ear by what is known as the "Rochester rappings." He referred to the investigations, the persecutions inflicted upon those young-girl mediums by the excited populace who were too prejudiced to accept the reports of committees chosen by themselvs, how the interposition of the police rescued them from the mob, who were as cruel and bloodthirsty in spirit and interest as those who hung and burned Salem witches, who were only mediums of their time. He cited the cruelties of the priests and popes vented upon the beautiful and gifted Hypatia, how she was seized in her temple when engaged in teaching philosophy to the wise men of her time, her person outraged, and then her palpitating form dragged through the street until dead.

Priest and church hav ever sought to crush out truth by killing its advocates and burning their writings. (In modern times they imprison under the rulings of Comstock law and heavily fine.) Orthodoxy for eighteen hundred years has failed to prove immortality. Spiritualism has demonstrated the truth that there is no death but transition. The church above others should be Spiritualist, for the Bible is a record of spiritual phenomena. Organization is most clamored for by those who seek fat places and honorary positions. Protestantism tends to disintegration, as shown by the hundreds of factions. Spiritualism, the full expression of the spirit of the age, its aim a high morality, political reforms demanded, its blessed assurance to those who accept its philosophy. The address was earnest, logical, convincing.

In the afternoon Mrs. Colby gave one of her earnest, powerful, pleasing addresses. Her earnestness is intense, ideas clear, forcible, scope far-reaching, subject matter practical, deals with living issues. She said she would giv more to see a person twenty-five who had never practiced deception and fraud than to see all the gods, devils, or angels Christianity had ever invented; instanced how the church pays a reward for vice, as witnessed in its dealings with Prof. Swing, Dr. Thomas, and H. W. Beecher—the first two were accused of heresy, their moral purity unquestioned, still were denounced for entertaining heretical views; the Plymouth pastor was in the minds of forty-five out of fifty believed to hav been infidel to marital vows. Still he was retained in the pulpit and his salary raised from $10,000 to $20,000. How many clergymen would not commit adultery for such a bribe? Referring to the cruelties and death of Joan d' Arc, she cited how the church and priest committed the dark deed at which the inured soldiery shrank from the committal. No crime or deed has been too dark or bloody for the church when its aggrandizment and furtherance were to be accomplished. She said Spiritualism had shaken theology, shipped off gods, demons, closed the gates of hell, and set humanity free.

Mrs. Emma Tuttle rendered the poem "Dave's Hollyhocks," very effectivly.

Moses Hull, in his address on "The Ministry of Angels," was just immense. His high oratory took the audience captiv. He is very pleasing, powerful, dramatic.

Space forbids further mention. With this suggestion we hav done: Let Liberals of all shades see to it that such workers as Moses Hull, and Mrs Colby are kept in the field, that Bro. Bennett's hands are upheld by the supply of the needful. Let all who can respond to the appeal of T. C. Leland for the National Liberal League. Grace L. Parkhurst.

Hammond and the Infidels.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ont., wishes to know whether the following statement recently made by the revivalist Hammond in Toronto is true:

"When in Washington he had extended an invitation to the president of the Infidel Association there. The invitation had been accepted, and the result was that the Washington association had been broken up, the secretary being now engaged in Christian work. The name of that secretary was P. C. Cheeks, and he hoped if there was an Infidel present who doubted what he said that he would write to Washington and inquire for himself if what he said was not true."

Before Mr. Hammond came to Washington in 1877 there was a Philosophical Club which held public meetings every Sunday afternoon. The president of that club was B. D. Peck, a government clerk. He had been a preacher in Maine, had never renounced Christianity, and while yet president of the club received and afterward accepted a call from a Baptist church in Rhode Island. But in accepting the pastorate I understand he declined to be catechized. He continued preaching there some time, and is now, I am told, the pastor of an independent Baptist society in New York city.

Mr. Cheeks took part in the discussions of the club occasionally. He had been educated for the priesthood, but had renounced Catholicism and become a Methodist preacher. But in 1872 or 3, when I first met him, he had become a decided skeptic and so continued until he got reconverted under Hammond. Soon after his last conversion he got a government office, and though he is out now, he is still a professing Christian and a Congregationalist.

Dr. E. V. Wright, one of the two persons who started the Philosophical Club, says that Mr. Cheeks was never its secretary. He also says (and I am very sure it is true) that the club was not broken up, nor was its attendance diminished during Hammond's preaching, but that it continued to flourish after the preacher's departure, and did not adjourn until the coming on of hot weather. And in regard to the alleged invitation by Hammond, he says that a committee of the club waited upon the preacher, but failed to get him to agree to any terms. Perhaps the Rev. Mr. Peck, now in New York, could giv more definit information on this point. But I am safe in saying that Hammond did not break up the club.

I well remember that James A. Garfield, after promising to deliver an address before the club, disappointed the audience and excused himself by saying that he heard it was an Infidel association. We hav had a series of similar clubs in Washington for many years, and there is one now flourishing finely called the "Thought Exchange," which meets every Sunday evening. None of them are called Infidel associations except by way of reproach, and they are always attended by Christians. Nevertheless I think Mr. Garfield was prudent in not appearing before the Philosopical Club, even though its president was a Liberal water-cure Christian like himself, for a single attendance might hav cost Mr. Garfield the presidency. A successful politician is always politic.

I myself attended the club sometimes, and though I may not hav done so till the last, I am sure that the statement of Mr. Hammond about its breaking up is false. W. H. Burr.

Washington, D. C., April 8, 1881.

A Vacation Trip.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The devil, it is said, never takes a vacation, and that is what makes him the devil. It is enough to make any one a devil not to hav any rest, any absolute repose. If the devil took a vacation he would probably behave a great deal better. Even ministers are improved by their summer frolics; much of the devil is taken out of their sermons and sweet mother nature has a chance.

So we took our vacation and shook the devil of care to the winds. We wanted quiet so we went to Boston, where the universe moves on in a very orderly and cultivated manner. On our way we stopped at Worcester, Mass., where the golden wedding bells were ringing and filled the April air with melody. Then we went to the "Hub" and found Chainey in the midst of his "revival," more wonderful than anything that Beecher or Talmage hav been able to manufacture; and this has not been manufactured, but is a fresh, spontaneous movement like the bursting of a fountain from the earth. It is what Liberalism has long been waiting for and the prophet and poet has come born of suffering and wide experience. The fire of Methodism and the culture of Unitarianism are blended in the Iconoclast, who tears down that he may build. It is really a Mecca for the thirsting Liberal. Paine Hall crowded to its utmost capacity, while the splendid eloquence of the speaker holds them like a strain of surpassing music. Surely no one is more capable of voicing the infinit hopes and longings of Liberalism than Chainey. He speaks with the passion of an intense soul. His subject was "The Lights and Shades of Liberalism." He painted the shades with a skilful and impartial hand and furnished a background upon which to throw the glowing lights of the future. He showed that the faults of Liberalism are merely on the surface and are the outcome of orthodox training. Liberalism is that to which all that is best and brightest in the world is now contributing. It is the result of liberty and knowledge. The orator unfolded this grand theme with blended wit and wisdom. The applause was frequent, and ripples of laughter broke forth as some keen stroke of humor flashed the thought like a sword in the heart of error. There was no monotony in the discourse; it gave an infinitly diversified view of the subject matter.

One might cry out, this was enough for one Sunday—in the city of Puritans—but fate was richer than our wildest hopes had painted. There was a conjunction on this memorable occasion of two planets, Jupiter and Mars. R. G. Ingersoll and his wife were present, and were greeted with thunders of applause as they quietly and modestly took their seats in the rear of the congregation. When called upon for a speech by Mr. Seaver after the lecture of the day Ingersoll cordially responded, and for a quarter of an hour gave us marvelous pictures of the good time coming as they came teeming from his capacious brain, with discourse that went before and after and glorified what was with the promis of what will be. He showed that his whole soul quivered with a love of freedom and that he was in sympathy with every effort to free the human mind from slavery and death. That Sunday afternoon will long be remembered. It struck the keynote of a mighty and magnificent future.

Yet this was not all, for in the evening Boston theater was crowded with several thousand people to listen to the "reason why" Mr. Ingersoll was not an orthodox Christian. The lecture was one of the most masterly ever delivered by that fearless orator. To hear Mr. Ingersoll is like listening to Gerster or seeing Salvini. There is the supremacy of art and the fire of nature. We are moved and thrilled as by the motion of the sea. Ingersoll is simply genius. We can never tire of his extraordinary eloquence. His discourse was packed with logic and was ablaze with wit and humor, and there was a grim earnestness in it hardly discoverable before in Mr. Ingersoll.

Now and then the thunderbolts of wrath descended, as if he himself had felt the hot iron of oppression. I think that Mr. Ingersoll never before so fully voiced the tremendous indignation of humanity against orthodoxy as a devil indeed, to be crushed and buried utterly out of sight. Hitherto he has wielded the sword of Saladin, but now he struck with the hammer of Thor. Hitherto he has seemed to play with orthodoxy as a serpent whose fangs hav been extracted, but now he seemed to grapple with it as a deadly monster that must be exterminated. As Mr. Bartol said, one would almost leap from his seat to hear some of his bursts of oratory, as when he thundered forth with the grand energy of a Titan that he had rather be annihilated than to sit at the right hand of God or to be God, while any human being was suffering at his expense. Mr. Ingersoll condemned, as every sensible man ought to condemn, both the Old and the New Testaments for the hideous doctrins they teach as infallibly inspired oracles. The New Testament is worse than the Old, for while the Old justifies slavery, polygamy, and wars of extermination, it is silent concerning the future period. Only when we come to the New Testament is the veil torn aside and the horrible dogma of eternal punishment proclaimed.

The services which Mr. Ingersoll is rendering to the cause of freedom are inestimable. He stands at a turning-point in human history. He strikes at the evils of the past that will not die except we stab them to the heart.

Besides Chainey and Ingersoll, we hav seen Bell and Seaver and Mendum and Verity and Wright, and they hav added to the riches of the view. We even ventured into what seemed to us the cold glitter of the Free Religious Index, and it greeted us with genuin human warmth. I guess it has a heart after all, in spite of its intellectual severity.

Yes, the world is moving. That is what our vacation is telling us, and it is saving us from the devil of despair. We hav been playing for a few days with all the carelessness of a child, yet in the midst of our playing we hav gathered the sublimest wisdom. Chainey said in his Sunday's discourse, "Never was my heart so light as now;" and we say the same.

Mr. Chainey's Infidel Pulpit is on the high road to success. He has already a thousand subscribers, and they are increasing at the rate of twenty and thirty a day. His parish now extends all over the United States. He ought to hav a million subscribers. Every Liberal should take a copy. The terms are extremely cheap. Only think, fifty-two lectures for one dollar—lectures full of the best and noblest thought of the day. Keep the ball a-rolling. Don't giv up THE TRUTH SEEKER, but just tack on to THE TRUTH SEEKER the Infidel Pulpit.

So much for our vacation. We feel twice as big as when we set out. We have carried Aladdin's lamp along, and endless treasures hav been revealed.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Linesville Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:
The course of Liberalism in Linesville, Pa., is onward. The late Paine celebration did much to advertise Liberal principles, and with many to understand Liberalism is to become interested in and take hold of it.

Moses Hull has been induced to locate here, for a year at least, and speak to us three times each month —once, on Saturday evening before the second Sunday, on things pertaining to political economy; twice on the second Sunday, forenoon on Spiritualism, evening on Liberalism. Mr. Hull is an eloquent speaker. He interests the people, consequently the audiences are large.

On Sunday, April 4, we held our annual meeting to elect officers. The officers elected were: President, S. C. Thayer; Secretary, P. M. Thayer; Treasurer, James Wallace; Board of Councilors, Mrs. Jas. Wallace, Mr. C. B. Brooks, Mrs. Isaac Ladner, Mrs. C. Butler.

The Liberal League enters upon its fifth year under very favorable circumstances, and we hope to accomplish much. We are looking for the time when priests, Comstocks, kings, lords, and all other religious and political oppressors will cease to rule nations; when it will not be considered a crime to doubt any and all things, either religious or political, that do not commend themselvs to our reason; when we will look to past history, not to make our laws by, but to learn where we can improve on all laws and customs that hav a tendency to oppress the people; when we will weigh our present laws by the amount of good or evil that accompany them; when people will learn when they are oppressed to look to the proper cause; when they will learn that as a rule increase of crime indicates corrupt government; that a righteous government makes a righteous people; and, finally, when all people will learn that happiness is the ultimate of each and all, and to make others happy is the only true way to become unselfishly happy ourselvs.

Hoping we may continue true to the cause of Liberalism, I remain, Respectfully yours,

P. M. THAYER, Sec.

Jupiter and Pike's Peak.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:
In your issue of Feb. 26th is a statement from Ira T. Scott, of Denver, Col., taking exceptions to my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29th, stating that Pike's Peak had burst forth in volcanic flames, etc. In order to set myself right before your many truth-loving readers, and that facts may be known in regard to the volcanic nature of this mountain, will you do me the justice and kindness to publish the following condensed article found in the Rochester, N. Y., American Rural Home of Feb. 26th, and credited to the Colorado Springs Gazette? A similar statement I saw several weeks ago.

PIKE'S PEAK A VOLCANO.

Conclusiv evidence that a volcano does exist, and not very far from Colorado Springs, has recently been furnished us by Sergeant O'Keefe of the Signal Service. The first knowledge that was given us of this peculiar and newly-discovered phenomenon was reported last Saturday afternoon, and since that time a Gazette reporter under the guidance of Sergeant O'Keefe visited the scene of what proved to be one of the most wonderful discoveries ever brought to light in this mountain region. Nearly all the citizens of Colorado Springs hav seen or read of the crater which is located near the summit and just west of the Peak. It has always been conceded by scientists that this same crater had in times gone by been the scene of a terrible eruption, as particles of lava had been discovered in the crevices of the rocks adjoining it. Those who hav investigated more closely the various formations which are peculiar to volcanic mountains generally hav affirmed that there are plenty of evidences to show plainly that Pike's Peak crater has in its center a circular or cup-like opening through which lava has certainly been emitted. It was on the night of Oct. 29th last that the crater displayed signs of volcanic activity.

Sergeant O'Keefe was aroused from his slumbers by a dreary, doleful sound which apparently emanated from beneath the signal station. His first convictions were that it was an earthquake, but this impression was soon dispelled by the fact that the sound still continued without the signs of a jar. He concluded to investigate the cause of this mysterious sound, and, in company with his assistant, F. L. Jones, dressed himself and started. They had barely stepped over the doorsill when a bright flash, at first thought to be lightning, surmounted the summit of the peak. It was only of a second's duration, and the peak was again clothed in darkness. From this time on the sound heretofore described seemed to decrease until the usual quiet of the solemn mountain-peak was again restored.

The following day Sergeant O'Keefe visited the crater, feeling confident that the sound heard on the night previous had emanated from that source. What was his surprise on looking down into the crater to discover vapor curling up from the cup-like enclosure. This discovery only prompted him to further continue his researches, and after two hours' laborious climbing he found himself standing within about 200 yards of the crater chimney. The heat, even at this distance, was very oppressiv, and the ground about him was covered with ashes and lava. O'Keefe was lost in astonishment. The snow for half a mile from the crater had entirely disappeared. This was all the more remarkable as it had upon the previous day been several feet in depth. The Sergeant was very much astonished at the remarkable discovery thus brought to light, but he was not deceived by the calm. He was convinced that the absolute repose then manifested would be of short duration. Since Oct. 29th but one eruption has occurred, and that was on the night of Nov. 7th, and was similar to the previous one, but more violent. He happened to be on the roof of the signal station on this occasion, and he portrays the majesty of the scene as the grandest he ever witnessed, not excepting that of Vesuvius, seen by him in 1862. The eruption began with a tremendous burst, which shook Pike's Peak to its very foundation, hurling into the air dense clouds of ashes and lava.

These explosions succeeded each other with rapidity and increased violence for about one hour, when the volcauo seemed to enter into a profound sleep. During the eruption the clouds were grandly illuminated by the reflection of the glowing lava in the crater, giving the scene the appearance of a vast conflagration. This will account for the peculiar light which had been noticed by the sheep-herders on the plains east of this city. Sergeant O'Keefe informs us that the flow of lava tends towards Ruxton's Creek, whence the water for the supply of the city is procured, and there is no doubt that the hot lava will, if it reaches the creek, so heat and foul it that it will be spoiled for drinking purposes. It is evident the eruption has but just begun, and should it continue any great length of time Colorado Springs may meet the fate of Herculaneum and Pompeii. The flow of lava has already extended three miles from the crater, and only two eruptions hav taken place.

This, Mr. Editor, is the authority for my statements in regard to Pike's Peak, and it seems to be truthful. I do not believe it to be a canard. If true, as I think it is, it shows how long neighbors may occupy this vicinage and not know each other. Also that Mr. Scott is mistaken as to the volcanic nature of the Peak. He thinks I am equally in error in regard to Prof. Tice's weather forecasts, etc., but says, "It must be admitted that some of Prof. Tice's predictions prove true, but far less, I think, than those of Prof. Richard Mansill, of Rock Island, Ill., whose theory is that the disturbing influence of the perihelion and aphelion passages of the planets, and the longitudinal conjunction of these bodies, is the true natural base and cause of our worst meteoric agitations." Prof. Mansill may hav some valuable ideas on atmospheric perturbations, cyclones, earthquakes, etc. If he discovered those laws fifteen years ago, then he reached the same results in the same year Prof. Tice did. If since that time, Prof. Tice must carry the palm. For our friend Scott says Prof. Mansill's theory demands that the "disturbing influences" of the planets occur at perihelion and aphelion, and "longitudinal conjunction." This is precisely Prof. Tice's theory, and I so stated in my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29th. I wish to be brief, Mr. Editor, but to be understood a short explanation seems needful, if you will bear with me. Every circle or orbit of a planet is divided into 360°—at 80 is "perihelion," at 260 is "aphelion," and at 170° and 350° are the lines of "longitudinal conjunction," or heliocentric longitude. These are the storm points as designated by Prof. Tice in all his weather forecasts. I appeal to his almanacs for every month in each year for the truth of the statement. Old Jupiter plays a large part in seismic and volcanic forces. Now our friend Scott has been misled by the verbiage of Prof. Mansill. The laws are identical, and I think Prof. Tice is entitled to priority of discovery. Mr. Scott says Prof. Tice's predictions are "far less true than Prof. Mansill's." Now really, if the laws and principles are the same, why cannot Tice predict as accurately as Mansill? Is he deficient in astronomical knowledge and observation? I would like to find his equal. Every storm of Michigan for the last three years has been on the day assigned by Prof. Tice. I hope all will examin this grand subject. It will pay them. If friend Scott will send me any work by Prof. Mansill I will reciprocate the favor. Truth against the world. Mt. Baker is the volcano instead of Mt. Walker.

Yours astronomically, D. HIGBIE, M. D.

Letter from Parker Pillsbury.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:
I hav just closed a little lecture engagement of three weeks (three Lord's days), in this Capernaum of Spiritualism.

You see I do not forget my old Sunday-school lessons. We were told "according as are your religious privileges and opportunities so will be your guilt and condemnation, unless you improve them!"

And the lesson was nailed down with this regular Bible double-ten, namely, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell!"

Rochester was the Bethlehem, was it not, where the messiah of Spiritualism was born. And many, many mighty works hav been done there in the name of Spiritualism, during all its thirty years and more. All its chiefest apostles and evangelists hav wrought there, much and well. Mrs. Fannie Allyn and Mrs. Amelia Colby with Mrs. Smith, her accomplished musical attendant, hav done good service there from the first of October to last of February statedly. But I fear the harvests hav not been, cannot be at all commensurate with the seed they hav sown. My mission was independent of any association, but wholly in the interest of Spiritualism and the Liberal philosophy. The best hall I could procure with the means at my command was close down to the railway station, where the shriek of locomotivs knows no Sunday, no cessation; and up three long flights of stairs at that.

Mrs. Allyn and Mrs. Colby had a comfortable hall, but it is no longer available for lecturing purposes. So the Spiritualists will hav to seek other quarters, never yet having tabernacle or temple of their own.

My faith in Spiritualism, its philosophy, phenomena and leading principles, cannot be shaken. But it is not confirmed nor strengthened by any activities or interest I witness among societies of Spiritualists, except in some rare instances, and those where more than mere Spiritualism, as a sect or formula, is taught and inculcated. And I hav been told that Mrs. Allyn and Mrs. Colby hav forfeited the favor of some Spiritualist associations by endeavoring to make their faith and works include all the great interests, necessities, and responsibilities of man and womankind, instead of keeping to trance, table-tippings, materializations, and other mere Spiritual phenomena. I hope we shall not languish, like the churches, till some Moody and Sankey will hav to be raised up to wake us to life and action, and put breath and "soul beneath our ribs of death."

My letter is already long enough. But the Cleveland Leader of to-day contains the following letter, written by "a learned Congregational clergyman of New Hampshire," too good to be lost. And I should like to hav it embalmed in your constantly crowded and widely read columns. It proves the evangelical stomach pretty strong when it can, at a strain even, take down a Campbell as easily as a gnat, when the interests of the church are to be promoted. And a Campbellist President may prove the safety as well as the seed of the national religious faith.

Rochester, N. Y. PARKER PILLSBURY.

THE LETTER.

"Many thanks for the Cleveland Leader containing the creed of the Campbellite church, which I hav read with much interest. It is rather more orthodox, as we Congregationalists see, than I had supposed, from what I had learned in Kentucky, when traveling there more than forty years ago in service of the American Missionary Society. I had supposed, from all I could learn of the creed of the denomination, that their religion consisted pretty much in immersion in the name of the trinity; any one doing so came out of the water a Christian, irrespectiv of previous character. To illustrate, a lady in one of the Kentucky towns told me there had just been in her neighborhood a Campbellite baptism. It was winter. A candidate for the rite approaching the stream, finding its cages ice-bound, drew back, swearing he would not be baptized until it was warmer. We of the old Puritan faith and order do not deem a state of mind that will allow swearing in the very act of professional consecration to God indicativ of a moral state of the heart suitable for a public profession of religion. But this was probably an extreme case. On the whole, I sympathize with most of the views expressed and the spirit with which they are uttered; modest, careful, scriptural, and sincere. If such be the religious creed of our candidate for the Presidency, to be inaugurated in a few days, we may hope for an administration, so far as our President may control it, that, with God's blessing, may result in good to our already great, and destined to be vastly greater, country in population, progress, wealth, and influence."

EUREKA, CAL., Feb. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You may put me down for $5 for your trip around the world. MRS. W. A. CORY.

DETROIT, MICH., Feb. 19, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: If you start on your trip round the world set me down for $5.

With many hopes that you will get back safe, I am, Yours truly, WM. PENFIELD.

LEONARD, NEB., Feb. 19, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: We hav been very much pleased with your letters from Europe, and hope you will get enough of the needful to send you on the grand tour of the globe. You can put us down for $5.

Best wishes, PETER and JANE GULICK.

SAN JOSE, CAL., February 13, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Put me down for $5 toward the trip around the world. As soon as I can spare the money I wish to get some more Liberal books. I stand firm for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Liberal cause, and our brave brother and hero, D. M. Bennett.

P. H. SCHWARTZ.

QUINCY, ILL., April 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You may count on me for five dollars for the trip round the world. I will remit the amount when called upon. I do not like the idea of taking you away from THE TRUTH SEEKER sanctum; but still it may turn out all right—at least I hope so. With best wishes for you and yours, and the cause which you so nobly defend, I remain,

Yours truly, FRANK H. SHERWOOD.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $8 for the paper and repairing Thomas Paine's monument. I will subscribe $5 for the trip around the world.

Respectfully, J. O. BENTLEY.

PAOLA, KAN., Feb. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Set me down for $5 for your trip around the world. Respectfully yours,

DR. W. WALTERS.

CHAPMAN, KANSAS, April 4, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $8—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the balance of this year, and $5 for the trip around the world. Money is quite a scarce commodity with me. I hav two reasons for subscribing to the trip. One is, I feel certain of getting the worth of my money; the other reason is, the books will be the cause of doing so much for humanity, so I feel in duty bound to help the good cause along. If this trip should drop through I will take books to the amount invested. I hav been trying to get more subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav not succeeded. Your friend,

JOHN. T. LAKIN.

WAUKEE, IOWA, April 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: By the tab on my paper I see that I am behind on subscription. I will pay up. I do not want to do without it.

I commenced taking THE TRUTH SEEKER when it first started at fifty cents per year. Several times since its size and price hav been increased, which I regretted at each time, but afterward was more than satisfied.

If you conclude to make the trip round the world let me know and I'll try to furnish a few dollars. Would like to hav you stay with THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A. L. GRINNELL.

HORNITOS, CAL., March 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My $5 for your trip around the world will be forwarded when notified that you will take the trip. I hope you will take some younger person with you to take care of you in case of sickness or accident. With best wishes for your success in everything you may undertake, I remain

Very truly yours, R. W. BARCROFT.

GREAT VALLEY, April 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the little tab on my paper that April 15th draweth near, after which time I shall be your debtor should you continue sending to my address the good old TRUTH SEEKER, which in my case has become a staple article and of great necessity. The thought of its deprivation is not a thing to be tolerated for a moment, now that I hav passed by a year or two of the zenith of my noon-day, and am on the side of life that tends toward the setting sun, hence will need to supply the wasting forces with strong meat seasoned with the viands of common sense and demonstrable facts, or at least not afraid to stand the test of the critic's eye or scalper's knife. Hence it behooves me, in order to get a supply of the above-mentioned articles, to inclose in this sheet three dollars to pay the doctor who not only applies the "Wilsonia" garments, for the eradication of all the impurities of the physical body, but givs at the same time and at all times a never-failing specific for all mental derangements of the mind caused by that little imbecil creature, faith. What for? Why, to believe what reason would reject of course, and then to deceive yourself into the idea that you hav met with a second birth—a more truthful name would be a "second death." Faith will do only for Christians and infants—the former don't want to reason, the latter cannot. Hence THE TRUTH SEEKER to the first class is inoperativ, and why? Too much faith and lack of brains to comprehend and solve it. The lack of brains in every case is attributable to the above-mentioned article, faith. There is but little hope of such, for they are dead and buried in Christ Jesus, having lost their wits through faith while living automatons acting only as they were acted upon by the ring-master, who is generally an ordained vicegerent butcher of Jehovah. Hence we can but rejoice now they are dead, for it gave us pain to see them catering to the behests and nods of some bigoted, designing priest.

But not so with the second class, the infants, for in them lieth the hope of the world, for as soon as their little minds become sufficiently developed they are going to ask who made this world that they see around them, and while their parents, many of them, will answer, God, their next query will be, Where did he come from, who was his mother, and who made him? Of course that will nonplus such papas and mammas, but it will only tend, through the evasion of their most reasonable inquiry, to stimulate them to further inquiry, and the first thing you will hear of them they hav run across some old Freethinker who tells them to send for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which will answer all their inquiries.

Then hell will be out for good, the devil loosed another thousand years. The pope will hav to lay off his disguise, the priest go to raising potatoes or starve. Reason will ask, Why support these lazy hypocrits longer in their rascality?

And now as to that trip round the world. Go by all means, say I. Were I a believer in fate I would say all hell can't prevent you, for were you not born for that very purpose, and has not nature designed and fitted you for the task, physically to withstand the variations of climate, and mentally to giv to the world a grander and more truthful narrativ of history of men and things past and present than has as yet been given by any other traveler? Methinks so, and hence you may put me down for $5. Do not giv me any credit for my generosity in so doing, as money with me is scarce, but when I consider what I am to receive should you liv to return, my self-interest prompts me to forego the $5 now that I may gain the $25 hereafter.

And now let me say to THE TRUTH SEEKER patrons to go and do likewise, even though you hav to borrow the money, and I will venture the prediction, leaving the future to demonstrate the truthfulness or falsity of my power to prophesy, that it will bring you in not only one hundredfold, but two, three, four, and five hundredfold, that is, if I understand rightly the editor's proposition to giv the book of travels to all those who advance $5. Come, now, let every Liberal send in his "V." Yes, every Christian too, for they will want the book of travels, and many will read it if they hav to borrow it from their more generous neighbors. Our Liberal libraries will be incomplete without it. So send in you pledges for a "V" when called for, and let's hav Bennett on the wing, that the sooner he goes the sooner he'll get back. Remember, he is a bold and fearless writer, says things that others wouldn't dare to say in Christian lands, and I will venture the prediction that if he finds he is abridged from telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, by Christian or heathen law, he will giv it to us when he returns, to put the same in book form, so that we are bound to get the whole truth in the book of travels, should he through policy omit a little in his letters he may send home. And as for THE TRUTH SEEKER losing much of its interest or reformatory vim, it will be enhanced in that direction by said letters of travel and the interest of its correspondents who will feel a greater responsibility in the absence of its editor to put forth an extra effort. Go by all means, I say again, and should you liv to return take Mrs. Bennett and visit your friends in your nativ land of America.

A thought, and I'm done. Methought, as I sat milking my mooley cow this morning, how varied were the life lines of certain individuals—as varied as the currents in water, earth, and air. For did they not confine the body of D. M. Bennett within the narrow confines of a prison cell, and that, too, as late as the year 1879? And now, in the year 1881, is there not a project commenced by which they think to elongate that same body by a stretching process to reach around this terrestrial ball? If the process works well a patent should be obtained by all means. No doubt the rubber companies will try to thwart the enterprise, but their efforts will prove abortiv, Benedict, Comstock & Co. to their aid notwithstanding. A. F. ALBRIGHT.

HOULTON, ME., April 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I agree with brother Burge as to the fee for life membership in the National Liberal League. There are many who would be willing to become members at $10 and could not afford to pay $25, and any who could afford the $25 would not be debarred from giving the other $15, or more, and I trust that there are very many that will do so. A Liberal would feel out of place to attend a Liberal convention and not hav the right to participate in the business of the convention. Therefore I second brother Walker's motion.

I hav been reading brother Leland's estimate in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 26th. His demands are moderate and should be seconded by every Liberal in the nation. We who do not submit to church taxation can afford to giv an eye-opener for the benefit of the blind, and when the scales drop from their eyes they will rejoice with us, and we shall be exceeding glad, for great is our reward on earth.

If Liberals would withdraw their support from the churches, their children from church and Sunday-schools, and keep the church institutions at arm's length, they would soon be in the condition of the emigrant who started for Aroostook, and painted on the side of his cart, "Aroostook or bust." They, like the emigrant, would soon "bust."

Herewith find $5, to be applied to your visit abroad. I see you are determined to make the circle.

Yours for truth and Liberalism, A. P. HEYWOOD.

BENNINGTON, N. H., April 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $5, three of which is to renew for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the other two forrepairs on the Paine monument. You may count me as one to contribute $5 for the trip around the world. You may well express your surprise at the indifference on the part of Liberals in the matter of repairing Paine's monument. How is it to be accounted for? Where are our "great orators" who hav been so loud in their praise and admiration of Thomas Paine? I don't see many of their names with $50 standing "forninst" them; not much. Talk is cheap. Is the human race worth redeeming from priestcraft and moneycraft? That is the question with me. How much choice is there between the two crafts? Where is the consistency of denouncing one and working in the interest of the other? Does the consistency consist in drawing big houses and pocketing big pay? Don't all speak at once.

Yours truly, GEORGE GEER.

JACKSON, MICH., March 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: A little less than a year ago, through the kindness of my friend, B. F. Eggleston, I became acquainted with your valuable paper, and through him became a subscriber for six months. I regard THE TRUTH SEEKER as a very valuable and interesting paper. It is doing a power of good in this vicinity in doing away with the dogma of orthodox superstition and giving us the right idea of the true God, liberty, and free speech.

Please find inclosed money order for $3 for continuance of the paper; also put my name down for $5, and I am also authorized to add B. F. Eggleston for the same, for the trip round the world.

Yours for liberty and free speech, P. E. PIERCE.

FRANKTON, IND., April 3, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: As this is another one of the Lord's days—rather a lordly one for me—I thought I would write you a few lines. I hav just been out sleighing with my family. The snow is about a foot deep and still snowing, and at the same time the spring birds are singing their sweet songs of praise to God.

Well, business, as usual, is suspended to-day except with a little squad of pious souls around at the church attending to the Lord's business, that is, they are making a last effort to raise a little money to pay for the bread that fed the mouth through which God talked to the people here the past year, but as I am not interested I am am not there. They got a negro troop from a neighboring town to come and giv a concert, out of which they made enough to pay the wash bill and a little over, though not enough to pay the board bill.

Inclosed please find $11—$3 to be applied on H. Alley's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 for your go-around-the-world or stay-at-home fund, just whichever it happens to be. I don't think that I envy you the pleasure of a trip around the world; it will beat the penitentiary all to the devil. I am afraid THE TRUTH SEEKER will be neglected; not but what it will be ably edited, but that friends will not send in their dues as promptly as they would if you were at home to jog them a little.

BERLIN HIGHTS, O., April 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I find myself indebted to you for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To tell the old story in the old parlance, "I was hard up," financially insolvent, or I was waiting for the co-operation of other subscribers to form a club (?). I pass, let this suffice.

I see that they hav almost persuaded you to take a round trip, and if wishes were worth a nickel, I'd giv you enough to keep you from the gnawing pangs of a hungry stomach during your sojourn, and if you should in the mean time receive a telegram from "Charon" (for people will and do die in all places), you would not make him a la corpse poor, but a good and a fat one. If I know when you would purpose to start out (and money is very uncertain to promis you in the future, as it is not now the people's public cancelling unit, but is under the exclusiv control of bank monopoly), will try on my part when you start out on the round trip to send you a "V." I did think of asking you to send me a lock of your whiskers as a memento of fond recollection in remembrance, i. e., if to cheat, as it might perhaps prove in the sequel, the infernal flesh-eating Feejee cannibal taking in the whole of your body without due regard to the rules of Spencerian politeness, but in looking over my file of love letters I find one of yours, written to me when you were incarcerated in the American Christian bastile, which I shall ever fondly cherish and love to keep in remembrance of you as a true friend to your country and a bold pioneer of the "Age of Reason," whether you sail or stay. Yours very truly, M. M. FISH.

HORTON, MICH., March 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In all the friendly correspondence to you for years past I hav been very much interested. I feel as much friendship and good will as the best of them, and only wish I could make it manifest in a more substantial way. I am one of that large class of citizens that we are apt to find on every corner—to wit, those that "hav seen better days." I hav been on the sick list for over eight years past, and many thousands of dollars that were mine hav changed hands and become the property of other people. I think if I liv, and you take that trip around the world, I shall contrive to buy the book, but I cannot say more at present. I am past three score years of age. How much do you think I hav (uncollected) in the hands of the poor? Over $50,000. There is where my possessions mostly lie.

But may the God I worship shower blessings upon you and the dear old TRUTH SEEKER! Please find inclosed draft for $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881.

For a few years past I hav been like Micawber—waiting for something to turn up; and if there does you will know it, for I shall send to you for a heap of books and tracts. Again, good-bye, and may God bless you and keep you and return you safe if you go!

ISAAC SNYDER, M.D.

LA CROSSE, WIS., March 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just read your remarks about the "Trip Around the World." I should prefer you to remain at home and attend to the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Those who are so very anxious for you to take the trip around the world should do something toward liquidating the remainder of the debt contracted in your trip to Europe before getting you into another trap. For my part, I want the friends to consider that it is very hazardous for an old man to take such a long journey; and, furthermore, I believe if Mrs. Bennett had her say in the matter, she would say, "I would rather he would remain at home than risk his life in such a long journey." But if it should be that the friends make up the amount of money, and it is determined you shall go, you can put me down for $5 when called on for the books.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., April 10, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: It is certainly a long time since I hav written to you, but you surely hav not missed my letters or my good wishes. If I had money to send you for your contemplated trip I should not be dilatory in announcing it; but having none, I am not sure that I hav any right to make any suggestions about it, going or staying. I trust you to do the best you can for Liberal thought and freedom to express it. I think, however, you need not go away for something to write about to interest your readers.

I hav been very much interested in Mr. Wakeman's "Lessons," and hope he has many more to giv us. Mr. Palmer's report of the funeral services of one of your Liberal friends was a great gratification to me. I am so dissatisfied with the popular funeral, and yet we hav hardly outgrown all ceremony over our dead. Perhaps we ought not to.

T. C. Leland's "Ways and Means" ought to be read and acted upon by every Freethinker in all parts of our country. If only the National Liberal League could hav money, how soon it would be a power in the land! Just now I can hardly think of anything but Comstockism, so fearful am I that our law-makers at Albany will extend his power. How glad I am that Mr. Wakeman did not fail to do his duty (when did he ever fail!), but faced the man Comstock with an exposure of his wickedness before the men who hav the power to prevent his further wrong-doing officially.

The letters which you gave us from Europe are full of interest, and your own articles need no foreign spice to make them palatable, and so THE TRUTH SEEKER in its new, beautiful garb, is always welcomed at our home.

Will you allow me to thank the unknown friend who sent me a pamphlet entitled "God and Man a Unity, and All Mankind a Unity" (you see I think I can reach the donor through THE TRUTH SEEKER)? The pamphlet seems to me a gift of value. I would like to know the author. The argument is conclusiv, the thought of the author is in its entirety good, and to me it brings "peace in believing."

Your very numerous letters remind me that I must not make mine lengthy, and so with love to Mrs. Bennett, yourself, and all the household of unbelief,

I am ever your friend and co-worker,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

MORRILL, KAN., March 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: My excuse for not sending you my subscription before now is that I hav been short of money. We hav had a very severe winter—the hardest for this country in twenty-five years. Times are hard. Grain is worth comparativly nothing. The railroad and elevator men pool and leave the farmers' profits nothing at all. With Jay Gould controling the railroads, telegraphs, and will hav control of the press before long; the bankers controling our money matters, large corporations stretching out and grasping all the resources of the country; when Wall street can rule Congress and bring the nation to its knees; when railroads refuse to furnish cars to men who dare pay more for grain than a stipulated price set by themselvs and elevator men; when men who wish to ship their own grain hav to pay tribute to the elevators, also two prices for cars; when they control all the material used by our manufactories, there is little show for the poor farmer.

It is time the country began to arouse itself before it is everlastingly too late. No people can long continue free and prosper who are in the power of a set of gamblers that can create a money panic in twenty-four hours. How can a farmer prosper if he has to sell his produce at certain men's prices and to certain men? If he wants lumber he is compelled to buy of a middleman, or ship it himself and pay a tribute of $15 per car load to the wholesaler.

A barbed-wire fence costs twice what it should because one company controls the patent. Iron, coal, oil, all of our productions, are being swallowed up in those large corporations.

How can it be remedied? Never by legislation so long as the people will be governed by the party that advocates principles contrary to the interests of the working classes. It is amusing to hear people who depend upon their daily toil for a living fall in with their party leaders and prate about strengthening the public credit, a strong government, centralization, the perfection of the banking system, etc. It does seem to me they don't know what they are talking about, or else they are willing to rivet the chains already forged for their hands.

We want a strong government, but centered in the people, not in a moneyed few. We want a money controled by the nation, not by a set of gamblers.

Our state legislatures hav become a humbug; our Senate and Congress, with such men as Hayes and Garfield ahead, a farce. We are now nothing but a tribute-paying class to a moneyed oligarchy. The Republican party has the name of liberating five millions of slaves; it also has the honor, with the assistance of the Democrats, of enslaving fifty millions.

I think, friend Bennett, it is the duty of all Liberals to try to educate the people in the political workings of the country as well as religiously—because it is the happiness and comforts of this life for which we are working—to let them see where they are drifting. Fusion with either old party is the death-knell of freedom.

Something must be done by the next presidential election, or legislation will be too late, and the only alternativ will be rebellion or subjection. It looks very much like subjection when armed soldiers are stationed in the halls of Congress at the inaugural of the President of this (said to be) free republic, and members of Congress and others were stopped by them as they entered the hall. Such a thing was never known before. I would like to see those questions discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER by some that are able to do them justice.

If I hav the money I will send you $5 for the trip around the world. I will not promis for certain, because I may not hav it; but you can set me down for the book.

Inclosed find post-office order for $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER this year. Yours for freedom,

J. W. SCOTT.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., April 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Find inclosed $1, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Abel Garr. Mr. Garr is a deep thinker, a lifelong seeker after truth as it is in fact if not in Jesus. This is the eleventh TRUTH SEEKER that is doing noble service as sapper and miner for the forces of Freethought in this village and vicinity. Our dear brethren and sisters hav toned down immensely since your "evangel" has been freely circulated among us. I send THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal reading to the clergy and the greatest bigots in this section. I hav reason to know that many receive such reading kindly. The few precious sisters hav been most acceptably quiet since they received copies of your paper of Jan. 1st, containing my "experience" with the female holiness of Berrien Springs.

May great peace be with you, my dear Bennett.

Ever yours, WORTHY PUTNAM.

ROCKVILLE, CONN., April 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please let me drop my ballot against your proposed trip around the world. The paper is lonesome, so to speak, when you are away. I vote with George Lynn, who has expressed some of my ideas in the matter much better than I could do it. See his letter in the issue of April 2d.

Yours respectfully, E. J. MARTIN.

LADOGA, IND., April 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am not with the majority in sending you round the world. Such banishment cannot help the cause of truth as much as your labors at home. I am not a subscriber to that fund, but I will giv $5 to a fund to hire you to not go. While I am aware the book you would write would be of great merit, I am satisfied your editorial work would be greater. Set me down for a "V" if you do not go.

Most truly yours, M. M. HENRY.

PATERSON, N. J., March 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As my subscription is about out and I shall be in your city in a few weeks, I will call and renew it.

If you desire to know how Liberalism is progressing in this place I will embody it all in a few words. A few weeks since I tendered my resignation to the League as president, and herein state my reasons for so doing, viz., the utter apathy and indifference on the part of Liberals to forego small pecuniary interests for the propagation of Liberal and progressiv ideas, i. e., a detestable avarice more worshiped than a high and worthy cause, as well as the contemptible lack of all true manliness in allowing themselvs to be intimidated by church power, even to the extent of a fawning sycophancy by giving fortnightly contributions to build up church tyranny under the false garb of charity.

The working classes will not emancipate themselvs when opportunity offers. Serfdom under the sway of the church will continue to increase. History will repeat itself and revolution be the inevitable result. I hav therefore come to the conclusion to retire from all official position in any and all humanitarian advocations in the city of Paterson. It is not often I use the language of church bigots, but must conclude this by saying, "They are joined to their idols, let them alone." JOHN J. HAVILAND.

Potiphar's Wife.

BY ALHAZA.

Hist! there is danger here!
And the pallid moon looks in,
And the withered wings of the hot simoon
Float from the land of sin—

The fearful desert land
Where the pyramid rises clear;
The sphinx looks calm o'er the deeds of blood
Nor pities human fear.

Leave not the icy tomb,
Sweet chiseled shape of eld,
Why are thy marble cerements
So lightly, loosely held?

Why dwell with the voiceless dead,
Thou beautiful form of woe,
With roses crushed on thy darksome cheek,
Beneath the moonlight's glow?

Do carven lilies weave
For thee a wreath of hope,
Above the mournful, beautiful eye
Of the desert antelope?

What! sobbing, marble heart,
With tears in piteous flow;
This is a living, beautiful form
That leans so fondly now.

Thy perfumed midnight hair
Lies on my pulseless breast
As storm-clouds fall, with sable wings,
Upon a sea at rest.

O, let me drink no more
Thy balmy, poisonous breath,
The wild sweet sounds on the stilly air
Are struck from this harp of death!

Dark woman, tempt me not,
To sin, and weep, and pray;
The air is filled with waves of love
To soothe the just alway.

Kneel not in shadow old,
Nor taste the deadly rue;
That darkens crypt and moss-grown aisle
Near Egypt's sacred dew.

Thy tortured bosom's truth
'Neath burning gems may dream,
The pearls strewn o'er that dangerous shore
Lie piteous wrecks between.

Sweet shapes come in from the tombs,
On Isis great they call:
"Oh, take thy tresses from my heart,
Or I shall feel their thrall."

A ghostly moaning throng,
From grottoes wierd, come near;
They hate the wine of sweet content,
They know not human fear.

Kiss not the sordid dust;
'Tis a shabby thing to pray;
Enthrone thy honor in thy breast,
And pluck the gods away.

The Death of Ahab Homerized.

BY AN OLD INFIDEL.

1 Kings xxii.

Attend, ye powers, at your dread sovereign's call;
Ahab at Ramath Gilead must fall!
So we decree. Now let the courier speed
With falsehood fired to consecrate the deed.
So shall our righteous vengeance be appeased,
When death's cold hand the recreant wretch has seized.
The courier sped at dread Jehovah's nod,
Approached the earth, concealing all the God.
The holy prophets saw; at once they knew
(A cloud concealed him from the vulgar view).
But hoary-headed Micaiah alone
Received an adverse message from the throne.
Now two huge antlers Zedekiah brings,
And straight approached the throne where sat the kings.
"O King," he said, and raised the antlers high above his head;
Them in the solid ground he plunged with force;
The earthy fragments flew along the course;
"So shall thy sword thy timorous foes disperse!
'Tis God's decree; his message I rehearse."
Israel's vain king, by God's decree misled,
Urged on the fight, and in the conflict bled.
His chariot left the field for him too late;
The perfidy of God had sealed his fate.
When gods essay their vengeful spite to try,
Priest, king, and people in one carnage lie.

My Pretty Little Rogue.

BY R. D. CHAPMAN.

As fair as the goddess Venus
Is the pretty little rogue I love,
And when thoughts are exchanged between us
There's no longing for the land above.

Though there may be angels in heaven
Bright, beautiful, and dear,
Yet none can cheer and enliven
As the one that I hav here.

Not a thoughtless, idle creature
Is that little rogue of mine,
But possessed of every feature
To relieve the suffering mind.

How often has she told me
Of the crimes we all too well know—
That the rich are ruling the country,
Making the poor poorer grow.

How those who pass life's day
A toiling in the sun
Are without a place to stay
When the frost of age does come.

Whilst those who never labored
Nor knew a thought of care
Were forever favored
With all the earth does bear.

Progression if once a virtue
Is now a heinous crime,
For prison doors await you
If born before your time.

Thoughts are bound with a chain
Wrought of the finest gold,
And stronger than iron main
By many a hundredfold.

Yet thoughts like you and I,
In some far distant day,
Will bloom and wither and die
Smoothing man's pathway.

Over the truth's she told me
I for long hours do muse,
Wondering how long it will be
That man will man abuse.

When humanity does assemble
In one grand group of love,
Our world will then resemble
The paradise above.

Then heaven will lose its charm,
Mankind will be at peace,
And without the fear of harm
All heavenward prayers shall cease.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

ixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted anthor and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Our depots are open free for inspection toall classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.

NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people ook up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life,and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DET. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

NO. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the 'WILSONIA" GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH.

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotteu with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

ARE we still Christians? My conviction is if we would not evade difficulties or put forced constructions upon them—if we would hav our yea, yea and our nay, nay—in short, if we would speak as honest, upright men, we must acknowledge that we are no longer Christians.—Strauss.

INTELLECTUAL liberty, as a matter of necessity, forever destroys the idea that belief is either praiseworthy or blameworthy, and is wholly inconsistent with every creed of Christendom. Paine recognized this truth. He also saw that as long as the Bible was considered inspired, this infamous doctrin of the virtue of belief would be believed and preached. He examined the scriptures for himself and found them filled with cruelty, absurdity, and immorality.—Ingersoll.

THE man who sneaks through life unwilling to express his genuin sentiments through fear of becoming unpopular with the rabble is beneath the respect of every intelligent individual, and should be ostracized by all truly intellectual persons.—The Platonist.

IT was here, as the sun was sinking, Irving [the celebrated Edward Irving, 1792-1834] actually drew from me by degrees, in the softest manner, the confession that I did not think as he thought of the Christian religion, and that it was vain for me to expect I ever could or should. This, if this was so, he had pre-engaged to take well of me, like an elder brother, if I would be frank with him. And right loyally he did so, and to the end of his life we needed no concealments on that head, which was really a step gained.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

WANDERING tribes do not, as a rule, consider it wrong to rob outside their clan; their god is therefore a robber like themselvs. If they settle in a fertil country, pass into the agricultural state, build towns, and become peaceful citizens with property of their own, they change their views respecting theft, and accordingly their god forbids it in his laws. But it sometimes happens that the sayings and doings of the tent-gods are preserved in writings which are accepted as "revelation" by the people of a later and a better age. Then may be observed the curious and by no means pleasing spectacle of a people outgrowing their religion and believing that their god performed actions which would be punished with the gallows if they were done by men.—Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THAT would be a great book, and he would be a great man, that should detect and eliminate the latent and disfigured truth that lies at the root of every falsehood ever yet believed among men.—W. R. Greg.

I find more profit in sermons on either good temper or good works than in what are called gospel sermons. The term has become a mere cant word. It has no determinate meaning. Let but a pert, self-sufficient animal that has neither sense nor grace bawl out something about Christ or his blood, or justification by faith, and his hearers cry out, "What a fine gospel sermon!"—John Wesley.

A MAN of benevolence, whose mind is enlarged by philosophy, will indulge agreeable anticipations with respect to society and will view all the different improvements in arts, in commerce, and in the sciences, as co-operating to promote the union, the happiness, and the virtue of mankind; and, amidst the political disorders resulting from the prejudices and follies of his own times, will look forward with transport to the blessings which are reserved for posterity in a more enlightened age.—Dugald Stewart.

FOND, impious man! Think'st thou yon sanguin cloud,
Raised by thy breath, has quenched the Orb of Day?
To-morrow he repairs the golden flood
And warms the nations with redoubled ray.
—Gray.

THERE are many men who hav a strong curiosity to know what is said, but who hav little or no curiosity to know what is true.—Bishop Butler.

GO to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise.—Proverbs. Another morning, which was wholesomer and better, happening to notice, as I stood looking out on the bit of green under my bed-room window, a trim and rather tidy hen actively paddling about and picking up what food might be discoverable. "See," I said to myself, "look, thou fool! Here is a two-legged creature with scarcely a half-thimbleful of poor brains; thou callest thyself a man with nobody knows how much brain and reason dwelling in it; and behold how the one life is regulated and how the other! In God's name concentrate, collect, whatever of reason thou hast, and direct it on the one thing needful."—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

LIVES of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow.

AS to the "glad tidings of eternal life," I know nothing of such incomprehensibles as "eternal lives." Every life I hav any knowledge of has had a beginning and has either already ended or is approaching a visible end. All the gods, even, die and are no more. The past to us is only the primer of our childhood. We hav learned its lessons, profited by its teachings; but we must go on beyond it. We must stand upon its shoulders and look over newer and brighter lanpscapes. Every age makes its pretenses and promises, but each succeeding age sees brighter and better ones ahead.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"THE liberty of the press must be preserved," said the small boy as he stole up to the cider-mill armed with a bundle of straws.

JAY GOULD used to work on a farm. And they do say he could fence more land into a forty-acre piece than any other ten men could crowd into a fifty.

A LITTLE girl was saying her evening prayer, "Giv us this day our daily bread," when her little four-year-old brother broke in with an amendment, lisping excitedly, "Better thay tookies, Mamie!"

"NOW I understand," remarked Oldenborg with a sigh, after vainly trying to get a view of the stage over the bonnet in front of him, "now I understand what they mean by the 'hight of fashion.'"

THE Portland Evening Post has had a tussle with the possessiv case and got licked. It says, "Lady Eastlake emphasizes the presence of one fine trait in the character of the late historian of Greece's wife."

THE editor wrote "An evening with Saturn," and it came out in the paper "An evening with Satan." It was mighty rough, but the foreman said it was the work of the "devil." And it looked that way.

ARABEL (on her toes in a chair, clutching convulsivly at her skirts)—"Oh, Bridget! A mouse! A mouse! Come and catch it, quick!" Bridget, "Shure mum, there's no hurry, if this one gets away I can catch plenty more for ye, mum."

SAID a Galveston school teacher, "If I hav ten apples and giv you five and your big brother five, what will be left?" "I'll be left," responded the younger brother," for he will get away with all of them. That's the kind of presidential candidate he is."

TENNYSON says the nightingales hav not sung at Farringford since the Prince Consort died. For an old man Alf keeps up with the procession pretty well. American liars should not be discouraged, however. They can wear him out in time.

AN Oil City boy who had been sent out collecting returned in the evening and handed in his bills unpaid, saying: "The people around this town like me first rate. They were so anxious to see me often that every man I went to told me to call again."

A CITIZEN of New Mexico being informed that in his absence a panther had attacked his wife and that she had beaten off and killed the animal, merely shrugged his shoulders and said, "Ef that panther had knowed her as well as I do he'd a never riled her up, you bet."

SCENE at the ball: Short sleeves—"No, thank you, Mr. B., I'm not dancing this evening." (Rashly.) "I've just been vaccinated."

Mr. B. (unacquainted with the resources of feminin ingenuity)—"Really? Didn't take, did it? Don't see any mark on your arm."

Short Sleeves (behind her fan, and thinking of her remark)—"No, I guess it didn't 'take.'"

PASSENGER on a ferry-boat in very rough weather: "Why do you want the fare to-day before crossing? We always pay when we get to the other side." Boatman—"Well, you see, sir, our orders is, 'In bad weather the boatman must be pertikler careful.' Now look; with this 'ere gale a-blowing,' how easy it 'ud be for us all to go to the bottom; and then what 'ud become of the fares?"

IT is said to be principally Delaware children who sing:

Old Daddy Ingersoll
Wouldn't say his prayers;
Take him by the right leg,
Take him by the left leg,
Take him fast by both legs,
And throw him down stairs.
—Courier Journal.

"LET me out! let me out! I've got salvation!" sobbed a thin man, in a many-pocketed ulster, up at the M. and S. meeting the other night, as he wedged toward the door. "Let me go home and bear the blessed tidings to my unbelieving wife." But all the same a suspicious detectiv jammed him up against the wall and unloaded from his pocket three watches and five pocketbooks, after which the services went on.

TWO Philadelphians were discussing the announcement of Anna Dickinson's appearance in males roles, when one of them remarked: "I wonder what ever induced her to try the character of Claude Melnotte?" And the other replied: "Well, you see, Anna Dickinson is a very peculiar woman, and the 'Lady of Lyons' is a very affectionate play. There was no choice for her between the roles of Claude and Pauline, because she's always been afraid, since she was old enough to wear long skirts, that if a man ever got his arm around her it would tickle her to death."

TWO young heirs, who had been taking their first lesson in grammer, disputed long and earnestly over a question, and at last agreed to decide it by arbitration, selecting the head of the family as arbiter, with full power to send for persons and papers. The old man was greasing his boots before the kitchen stove.

"Father," said the elder heir, "is it proper to say 'we is rich' or 'we am rich?'"

The old man worked carefully down into the hollow of his boot under the instep, remaining a long time in thoughtful meditation, and then slowly replied:

"Well, I should say it would come nigher to the truth to say we hain't rich."

The young heirs, when they come to think what a hard time they had worrying pennies out of their paternal relativ, thought it might be made that way too. And the old man kept on anointing his boots with the extract of hog.

Notes and Clippings.

A CLEVELAND Presbyterian pastor has been arraigned before his presbytery for sending his family to theaters and balls.

IT only cost a minister's wife in Canada a $5 fine for beating a little orphan girl in her employ with a hot poker. If she was a wicked worldling, now, she would hav gone to jail.

A PASTOR at Danville, Vt., denounced from his pulpit those members of his congregation who were in the habit of taking summer boarders. His idea is that city sins are propagated by the guests.

THE Rev. Mr. Titus, of Indianapolis, challenges anybody to take the negativ of the following proposition in a public discussion: "Resolved, That it is right for a minister to take all the people are willing to giv him."

A HEN flew into a house near Rockcastle, Pa., the other day, and knocked down a rifle that was hanging on the wall, which was discharged, killing a preacher that was visiting the family. Another of the inscrutable dispensations of Providence.

A PRESBYTERIAN pastor in Philadelphia performed a marriage ceremony for two young persons in opposition to the wishes of the families to which they belonged. These families were wealthy supporters of his church, and hav now expressed their indignation by leaving for another place of worship.

RITUALISM at the church of the Advent, in Boston, is in many respects more marked in its advance than in any other Protestant Episcopal church in this country. The services are but slightly different from those of the Roman Catholic church, and the priests wear their cassocks out of doors as well as in the church.

THE Volksblatt of Stuttgart says that the papal finances are in a bad condition, and it urges the faithful to tender speedy and generous aid, both in special gifts and in larger annual contributions. This information is reported to be confirmed by correspondence between Rome and French and German bishops.

THE audience at a St. Louis Spiritual seance expressed dissatisfaction with the manifestations, and the medium rashly said that those who wished to retire could get their money back. There was an immediate rush by about five hundred persons, and being unable to recover their fifty cents apiece, they mobbed the ticket seller, who might hav been killed if the police had not protected him.

THERE had been a serious division in the colored Methodist church at Elizabethtown, Ky. A meeting of the members developed a great amount of bitterness. When all in favor of a certain resolution were requested to hold up their right hands Bro. Winterbower's hand was uplifted, and Bro. Lee shot a bullet through it. Both men then fired indiscriminately, and the gathering dispersed without waiting for a formal dismissal.

THE Methodist church at Osnabruck, Ontario, is being repaired. Pastor Hudgins supervises the work, keeping an account of the expenditures in a book, which is left with Trustee Bryan for audit. The clergyman called for it a few days ago, and it was refused by Mrs. Bryan. He undertook to take it by force, and a fight ensued, in which the women was soundly whipped. Hudgins has been committed for trial on a charge of assault.

THE great cavern which was discovered last year in Colorado has been thoroughly explored. Fifty rooms are accessible, and many of them contain a profusion of stalactitic formations, in some cases translucent, and in others varying in color from red to pure white. Shining crystals, tufts of satiny fiber, slender arms resembling growths of coral, rams' horns twisted in every conceivable way, pillars, pendants, statuets, and grotesque shapes of life are among the curiosities of these halls.

A SINGULAR and promising incident in connection with the great work of the National Liberal League occurred in this city recently. Mr. T. Jacobs, President of the San Jose and Santa Clara Auxiliary Liberal League, came here to secure volunteer speakers for the League of which he is chief, and, oh, "tell it not in Gath," he was successful in securing the enthusiastic services of two ex-Christian ministers and two prominent Jewish citizens, each and all of whom are excellent speakers, and just as "good men as the Lord ever let liv." The world moves, and Jacobs is a brick.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

THE disparity of the sexes in churches is placed by Zion's Herald at two to one in favor of the women, and the same paper also makes the following rather startling statement: "If we were to take the churches right through the country, we should probably find that not more than one-tenth of their members are men in the prime of life. The other nine-tenths are women, men who hav passed their meridian, and youths who hav not reached their maturity. It is also to be observed that in almost every community the majority of the energetic, enterprising business men are not avowed and activ Christians; and if they are identified with the church at all, it is usually only in the most superficial way."

ACCORDING to the Russian papers a new sect has been formed at Ancyfrov, in the government of Moscow. It has already some hundreds of members of both sexes, and its chief characteristic is that all religious ceremonies, such as christenings, marriages, funerals, etc., are performed by a woman who is young and unmarried and has been elected by the members of the sect as their pope. They hav struck out of their religious service all the prayers for the czar and the bishops, and hav introduced prayers for the United Greek Metropolitan in Galicia and for the emperor of Austria instead, on the ground that "all religions are tolerated in Austria and enjoy entire freedom there, while in Russia every one is persecuted who does not profess the orthodox faith."

"HEAVEN," said Dr. Fulton last Sunday, "is built for ladies and gentlemen." Why not say plainly that only about one person in a quarter of a million will be saved? From all we can learn heaven is to be a very exclusiv and fashionable place. An honest farmer or mechanic need not hope to hav a seat there. It will perhaps be conducted on the principle that controls many of our fashionable city churches. A poor, plainly-dressed person will hav no business there and will be pointed to the door. Heaven then will be run in the special interest of priests, pious deacons, and heavenly-minded hypocrits. We shall not be anxious to join that crowd. We would rather go to hell with honest, common-sense people than to heaven with sycophants, sniveling hypocrits, and scoundrels.

THE Johnson street M. E. Church, in Brooklyn, is still in rebellion against Bishop Wiley's appointment of the Rev. B. F. Reeve as its pastor. The Rev. B. F. Reeve has assumed charge of the church, and although Rev. Mr. Hargrave was summoned by the congregation from New Platz, he has retired from the contest for the present, and Mr. Reeve will occupy the pulpit. The church trustees aver that they will not pay Mr. Reeve for his services, although it is claimed that thirty years ago, when a similar difficulty arose in the same church, the parishioners were compelled by mandamus to receive and support the pastor. It is understood that the presiding elder has persuaded Mr. Hargrave not to keep up the fight, and that he is endeavoring to reconcile the trustees to the bishop's appointment.

COL. INGERSOLL delighted an immense audience last [Sunday] night and can be sure of many more, for every bad character in New York wants to believe that Christianity is a fraud.—New York Herald. This is an infamous lie. It is the bad characters who believe in Christianity and hope to slip into heaven by the merits of its founder. The opponents of the Christian system expect to secure no happiness save by their own good deeds, and it stands them in hand to do about as well as they know how. With Christians it is the reverse of this; they may commit all the sins they please and a belief in Jesus's blood washes them all away. Just to think of it, a servil, subsidized, conscienceless paper, whose owner is a drunkard, a gambler, and a libertin, putting on pious airs, lauding Christianity, and berating unbelievers in the system!

SOME of the people of Burmah, who hav not yet accepted Christianity, are finding their own religion so unsatisfactory as to feel a desire for something better. The idea is expressed among them that possibly a new Buddha may come before long, to meet the demands of the new state of things brought about by steam and electricity. An intelligent Burman in a railroad car being asked, "What signs of a Buddha do you see?" replied: "I see change in all things. Five years ago we were all afraid when we saw these iron wires on the tops of the telegraph posts, but now we see scores of birds sitting up there. Two years ago I was afraid of this great fire wagon, and walked half a day rather than venture this ride of an hour. Now I never think about fear, but sometimes sleep all of the way. Everything is so changed that I think a new Buddha will come to us."

THE case of the two Indianapolis husbands who agreed to swap wives, by means of divorce, is curious. The couples were intimate friends, and the trade has been amicably carried out. Dr. Baumuller went to St. Louis on his honeymoon tour. "Mr. Richter and I," he said to a Republican reporter, "are like brothers. Not very long ago I discovered that I loved Mrs. Richter better than I did my own wife, and that she preferred me to her husband. I also discovered that Mr. Richter and my wife stood in exactly the same relation to each other. What were we to do? Quarrel? It was useless. It was so and could not be helped. I had tried to suppress my feelings, and I would hav done so if I had not found that Lena, my wife, loved Richter and that Richter loved Lena. We did not quarrel; we arranged everything. We met, all four, Richter, Mrs. Richter, my wife, and myself, at Richter's house, and there we talked the matter over until we concluded that the best thing to be done was to seek divorce."

AN Italian writer on the recent catastrophe on the Island of Ischia mentions those prognostics of an earthquake which are derived from animals. They were observed in every place where the shocks were such as to be generally perceptible. Some minutes before they were felt, the oxen and cows began to bellow, the sheep and goats bleated, and rushing in confusion one on the other, tried to break the wicker-work of the folds; the dogs howled terribly, the geese and fowls were alarmed and made much noise; the horses which were fastened in their stalls were greatly agitated, leaped up, and tried to break the halters with which they were attached to the mangers; those which were proceeding on the roads suddenly stopped and snorted in a very strange way. The cats were frightened and tried to conceal themselvs, or their hair bristled up wildly. Rabbits and moles were seen to leave their holes; birds rose, as if scared, from the places on which they had alighted; and fish left the bottom of the sea and approached the shores, where at some places great numbers of them were taken. Even ants and reptils abandoned, in clear daylight, their subterranean holes in great disorder, many hours before the shocks were felt. Some dogs, a few minutes before the first shock took place, awoke their sleeping masters by barking and pulling them, as if they wished to warn them of the impending danger, and several persons were thus enabled to save themselvs.

Liberty and Purity: How to Secure Both Safely, Effectively, and Impartially.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK IN OPPOSITION TO A BILL TO LARGELY INCREASE THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, MARCH 23, 1881.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN, OF THE BAR OF NEW YORK.

CONTINUED.

By an almost accidental, certainly by an ill-considered, obiter dictum, the Supreme Court of the United States has, in the Jackson case, put itself apparently in favor of the Comstock postal laws. By an amusing accident, or by "judicial log-rolling," the opinion is delivered by Mr. Justice Field, who figures as the most extreme "States' rights" judge on that bench. The revenge that truth and justice have from the disposition of the case by such a judge is that the false position of the judge has compelled him, notwithstanding his great ability, to give an opinion which proves that the decision should have been the other way.

Because the Liberals insist that this decision should be regarded as Jefferson regarded the Alien and Sedition law decisions, Jackson the United States Bank decision, and Lincoln the Dred Scott decision, this Agent advertises them to his clergy and their extensive laity as the vilest of human beings, combining in what he calls a "diabolical conspiracy." Our government enables him to do and publish this sort of work under an official oath!

ONLY THIRTEEN!

So far we hav convicted this agent of wilfully bearing false witness against his Liberal neighbors in the matter of expressed sentiments, and purposes. With his customary jesuitism he excuses himself for this because they pass, he says, "resolutions which on their face appear, to say the least, to be plausible, while their acts are at variance" with them. The latter third of his book is an assertion that the Liberals are the champion obscenists of the country, that Liberalism and obscenity are one. "INFIDELITY WEDDED TO OBSCENITY" is his text for dreary pages of ill-arranged and disgusting vituperation.

There is not one word of truth in it, and he knew it, but he believed that a lie well stuck to would be better than the truth, and would more certainly and profitably deceive "the elect."

I say he knew it, because he had right before him the figures that proved the falsity of all these statements and he purposely suppressed them.

The fact is that out of 450 persons arrested by him for offenses of this kind in seven years there have been but thirteen whom even he dares to class as "Liberals," and the rest belong about half to the Catholics and half to the Calvinistic sects. He knew that his own figures proved, if they can prove anything, that the stronger the orthodoxy the stronger the obscenity. He is fond of publishing his "statistics," but he has never told us the religious complexion of his offenders. Why? Because if he did the cry of Liberalism and obscenity would drop at once and Orthodoxy and obscenity would take its place.

A Liberal friend, Mr. Croffut, who wants to be a Comstockian if possible, obtained these figures from the Agent's own books and statements. The fact is that the Liberals sent petitions of 70,000 names to have the United States Comstock Postal Laws repealed or modified, and sent 200,000 names to President Hayes to have Mr. Bennett pardoned, but they have furnished no real obscenists. The real wedding is between obscenity and orthodoxy if any "bans" there are.

It is patent that he has "borne false witness" as to the facts as well as the opinions of his opponents. He has sought to heap the whole burden of obscenity upon the Liberals, calling them obscenists, smut dealers, etc., hoping that by piling this prejudice upon religious prejudices already existing he could crush them out in the interests of his paltry sectarianism.

But the fact is there were no thirteen Liberal obscenists, and probably none at all, if a proper count were made and real guilt considered. A Liberal offender of this kind is in fact a contradiction in terms, a rare bird, a white blackbird, even when counted black. He knew all this, for in my Faneuil Hall speech I clearly pointed it out to him thus:

"What are profanity and obscenity anyway but the corruption and disintegration of theology? It is only depraved 'theologians,' not Liberals, who misuse theological names, and turn purity into obscenity in word and deed. Liberty, knowledge, truth, and health will scatter both as the pure breeze clears the noisome air. To purify the fountain, do not break nor obstruct it, but let the water run fresh and clear."

A Liberal may be defiant and eccentric and not have much respect for what he calls church or priest morality. But obscenity or disrespect and dishonor of sexual matters or of relations to the opposite sex he is pretty sure not to be guilty of. So when this Agent tries to make out some few Liberal offenders he takes those who are not really Liberals, or who else are not really guilty. To make 13 he throws in all "Spiritualists," "Freelovers," "Infidels," "Don't cares," etc., who never belonged to any Liberal body at all, and then all the editors like those named in the above-quoted sixth resolution of the League. But these editors were not really guilty. They were simply defiant, and did what they did to defend the liberty of speech and of the press against these very attacks. "Something must be pardoned to the Spirit of Liberty," said Burke, and when that portion is granted, this Agent's 13 cases fairly disappear.

HIS ATTEMPTS TO SLANDER AND RUIN MEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE.

That number 13 was too small and too doubtful to be of any use, so he cunningly kept it to himself. But he must have something to excuse his monstrous assertions. To do this and divert attention from the fact that the League consists of thousands of men and women as pure, good, and honorable as any in the country, he makes a hallaballo over the past lives of two or three men who have, or have had, some connection with the League. He thinks he has found two bad specimens, and he immediately asks, according to his notions of justice to Liberals, for the execution of the whole lot.

But let us see for a moment if these two men deserve execution. After what we have seen no sensible man should hang a dog on his judgment or oath.

Prof. A. L. Rawson became a Secretary of the League in 1878, and ceased to be such last year.

Some scavenger found out, for this Agent, that in 1851, thirty years ago, while Mr. Rawson was young and poor and a theologian, and in New Jersey, he was accused of larceny in taking a coat, which however really belonged to him. He was a stranger and defenseless, and as too many do in such cases, sought the easiest way out by letting the clerk enter a plea of guilty so as to get a lighter punishment.

There was no trial on the merits and he was never really convicted at all.

The facts became known shortly after, and the Court of Pardons, at its first meeting thereafter, gave him a full pardon, which I have seen, and which was equal to an honorable acquittal on the merits, for the things he was charged with taking were shown to be really his own. This Agent digs up and publishes this old story, never mentions the pardon, and never ceases to ring the changes on "convict," "thief," etc., instead of calling Mr. Rawson by name. Is not this meanness far beyond that of any thief?

Again, in 1864, over sixteen years ago, Mr. Rawson's wife, principally for reasons of "faith," which Mr. Rawson had outgrown, wished to get a divorce from him. He was convinced that her orthodox relatives would no longer let her live with him happily. He was, therefore, man enough not to wish to keep a woman in bonds to him. There was no adultery to complain of, so her Lawyer was induced to plead that he had had a former wife living at the time of the marriage, and formal proof was obtained without Mr. Rawson's knowledge. So that a formal divorce was obtained by default without his taking any part in it whatever. The fact was not true. There was no former wife, nor was there ever a prosecution for bigamy, nor charge of any kind. This divorce was obtained at Syracuse, New York, in which State divorce records are by law prohibited to be shown to any one but the parties; but the scavenger violated the laws, and got hold of these old divorce records, and this Agent prints them, and shouts with infinite gusto, "Convicted bigamist," when there was no bigamy and no pretense of a conviction. Mr. Rawson had since become a Liberal and a useful and honorable member of his profession as an artist. All of these matters had gone out of sight and memory. Time and Death had buried them. Would anybody have exhumed them to gloat over them but a ghoul?

At the last meeting of the Congress of the League at Chicago, 1880, Mr. Rawson withdrew his name, so as to free the League from any aspersion, however unjustly, on his account. Could he have acted more honorably? But this Agent suppresses that fact. Could anything be meaner than this suppression?

It seems, too, that a Defense Committee had been organized after this Agent's attacks upon several Liberal editors and others of doubtful guilt, to hold him in check and to see that the innocent did not suffer without at least some attempt at defense. Mr. Rawson was familiar with philanthropic work, and was selected as its President. He was known to be honorable, faithful, and efficient. The League, when he withdrew as its Secretary, recommended that he be retained in that position. Why not? Shall these antediluvian stories destroy a man's usefulness forever? Is there to be no such thing as forgiveness on earth, even if misfortunes or faults there have been? "Cruel as hell, remorseless as the grave," is not the League's motto, nor that of any human being.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, the well-known editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is another instance of this agent's capacity for persecuting and traducing those who differ from him in "religion" and yet venture to cross his path. He charges all this editor does to the League, while his only connection with it is that he has with dozens of others been one of the nominal Vice-Presidents. He has never held any other office in it, and but seldom attended its Congresses. He has pursued his own course and done his own work, and he is not responsible for the League, nor the League for him, nor has he dictated its policy or controled it.

But he is an able, fearless, hard-working, good-hearted, truthful advocate of the emancipation of the souls of men. With a touch of humor like that of Horace Greeley, he lightens up the dryest discussions with the light of good nature and human sympathy, yet he is in some respects an exceptional man. He is so trusting, innocent, and sincere that he is readily imposed upon, and yet smart enough to be the first one to see his blunder, and always truthful and honest enough to own it frankly, however bad it may be, and say, "Well! well! they have got me this time, but I won't do so any more." Those who know him best love him best, for his worth and merits far outweigh his defects and faults. The Agent's narrow, selfish, bigoted nature can have no appreciation of such a genial, whole-souled, and yet in many respects childlike man. Where this editor was really sinned against by this very Agent, he is presented in this book as only a deep-dyed, malicious scoundrel. The facts have been well known to me, and I have been not a little amused to see how the real sinner triumphantly blackens the man he has sinned against.

The two main instances of Mr. Bennett's innocence turned to guilt by this Agent's malignity are all we have time to refer to; his other minute details and all of his epithets will drop with them.

In the fall of 1877 Mr. Bennett issued a circular stating facts which he believed to be correct, which requested editors, authors, physicians, druggists, etc. to sign a petition for the repeal, etc. of the U. S. Comstock Postal Laws. This circular had some dozen or twenty names to it (p. 403) of parties who were well known to favor the object and who had so expressed themselves. Owing to that fact Mr. Bennett in his innocence did not get them to write their names to it. He printed their names to the proof-sheet, and then went to the parties and showed it to them and asked their consent to the use of their names as printed, and left a copy with each one.

Where consent was not given by them, as he understood, he struck the name off. Some few he left with the understanding that he should hear from them if they had any objections, and hearing none and knowing their sentiments their names were kept on. This was all done in good faith, and in the sheerest innocence. But in no way could this editor have more effectually put himself in the power of this wily Agent.

Hardly had this circular seen the light before the Agent was down on these men with coaxing or threats of arrest and prosecution. This terrorism and treatment actually caused six of these parties to sign, or to appear to sign, some paper certifying that their names had been used without their authority. One other firm was induced indirectly to publish a similar statement.

Upon the strength of these disavowals thus obtained, or made, the Agent charges Mr. Bennett with having forged these seven names (pp. 427–8). This is the greatest, the principal of all the crimes he has to charge upon this editor and to make a terrible noise over. Now what does it amount to? I have or can and will produce the affidavits or statements of a majority, if not of all, of these seven parties showing that the disavowals were the Agent's own work, extorted by him, and that the original use of the names was substantially justifiable. In a word, it is now proved that the blunder was Bennett's and the crime Comstock's. The affidavits of Messrs. Crocker & Colyer, formerly the printers of Mr. Bennett's paper, but who have now no connection with or interest in him, reveal the mixture of terrorism and fraud under which these disavowals were obtained. As Mr. Bennett said, "a general fear or apprehension of Comstock's power seemed to hang like a terrible nightmare over the entire community." The very people who had denounced his methods most violently were the first to disavow the moment he came in sight, with his threats and revolver.

The Agent was not slow to use the advantage thus wrongfully obtained to defeat the object of the petition. He narrates with evident glee how he used these very disavowals to impose upon the committee of Congress and how successful they were. In all this fraud upon the committee and outrage upon Mr. Bennett he shows no more moral sensibility than if he had been born a rhinoceros.

Another matter relevant here and proved by these papers is the outrage of his terrorism, which this irresponsible power of accusation is sure to produce. The visits of this Agent to the office of the printers of THE TRUTH SEEKER referred to in Mr. Crocker's affidavits and others were occasions of dictation and threats, violent and disgraceful beyond expression. He ordered the presses to be stopped and the paper suppressed under threat of instant arrest and terrible punishment, and that he would certainly ruin the printers if they did not stop doing Mr. Bennett's work. It was only with the greatest difficulty that the terrified printers could be made to withstand his bulldozing and issue the paper. For all this he had no warrant but his revolver.

The printers finally resolved to face the music, and it subsided, but I shall never forget the terror in which they repeatedly came to my office under the actual belief that they would be arrested on their return, and arrest would have been ruinous to them.

The storm blew over as to them when the disavowals were obtained. But the agent all the more determined that Mr. Bennett should be destroyed. He examined his stock personally and tested and decoyed to find a pretext. He had had him arrested upon two little pamphlets, but the authorities at Washington thought the matter too silly and ordered it dropped.

At the Watkins Convention, September, 1878, he was again arrested, as he believed, as the result of this Agent's doings, for accidentally selling "Cupid's Yokes" at a book-stand while waiting upon it for the regular attendant who was absent. An indictment was found upon this arrest, but was abandoned long afterwards after much expense but no trial.

Mr. Bennett had not approved of this pamphlet and had not kept it for sale. Its author and publisher, Mr. E. H. Heywood, of Massachusetts, had been prosecuted by this Agent, convicted under these United States postal laws, and pardoned by President Hayes, whose Attorney-General, General Devens, of Massachusetts, had decided that it was not within the prohibition of the law. His words are:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
WASHINGTON, Jan. 13, 1879.

ELIZUR WRIGHT, ESQ., Boston, Mass., Sir: I have received your letter of the 10th inst.

In regard to the book itself, while it seems to me a publication not desirable to be made, I am aware that there may be much difference of opinion upon the subject, and do not confound it with those obscene publications the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions.

Very respectfully, CHAS. DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

Mr. F. E. Abbot, Mr. Oliver Johnson, Mr. O. B. Frothingham, Hon. Elizur Wright, Mr. James Parton, and many others too numerous to mention concurred in this view of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. Bennett then said in his paper: This fight for the "Liberty of printing" has to be made upon something, and I propose to begin here. I do not approve of this pamphlet, but as a bookseller I sell everything that is marketable whether I approve of it or not, and I propose to sell this pamphlet as I do other stock, "and if it means prison, then prison let it be."

This Agent renewed his decoys on the "old Infidel," and soon had a copy mailed to him through a cunningly-worded letter, apparently from a post-office in Washington county. Though the offense, such as it was, was all within this state, the Agent made the charge under the United States Postal Laws in a United States Circuit Court, for the reason, as he afterwards put it, "that we always convict in that court," but not always in the state courts.

The trial resulted in a conviction, as a matter of course; most unjustly, as Mr. Bennett and his friends are now more convinced than ever. The appeal was only to the two judges of the district sitting with the judge who had presided at the trial. The judgment was affirmed. The law permitted no appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Bennett was sentenced by Judge Benedict to the Albany Penitentiary for thirteen months and to pay a fine of $300. Everybody who knew the facts knew that both the prosecution and the trial were an outrage.

There was a general outburst of indignation; and as the Attorney-General of the United States had declared the pamphlet not within the law, and as Heywood, the Author, had been already pardoned, it was believed that Mr. Bennett's case would be similarly treated. Petitions, amounting to two hundred thousand names, were sent to the President from every part of the country. The Agent mustered his clergy, and they wrestled mightily with the President. But the pardon was finally ordered—only to be countermanded. Why? Because of the second great charge the Agent holds up in horror against him in his book.

In a word, Mr. Bennett had been too innocent with Delilah, and she had betrayed him to "the Philistine Agent." It was natural enough. Look at the man and the temptation. Until nearly middle-age he had been brought up as a Shaker—a celibate, of course. Then he and his childless wife had, John Anderson like, plodded on the dry roadway of life till it began to slant.

A Delilah, who has since danced at Niblo's, rich in love and doubtful experiences, came into his employ. To get into his confidence she revealed to him and gave him lessons from her experiences, and he, foolish, as men will be, wrote down what others would think but conceal. What she had taught to him in words, some of which he had only learned from her, he returned to her in letters with an innocence novel and laughable.

At the most "'twas but a futile dalliance." The man soon saw that he was being misled. The Siren was banished with her letters. The matter was explained to the wife and friends, and freely forgiven and buried.

This was several years before this trial, and had nothing to do with it. Delilah, to raise the needful, had kept the letters and offered to sell them for three hundred dollars, but no one wanted them; even Mr. Bennett refused to give anything for them; his friends did not want them, and until this Agent appeared, and made them, he had no enemies.

This was just the material for the Agent. He bit at once. Delilah and her letters were led in triumph before President Hayes, and he was duly astonished. A Spiritualistic newspaper brought them out with double-leaded horror. The clergy beat their tom-toms anew. The President was a good man, but also goody, and had no backbone suitable for any such emergency. Bennett was kept in prison, not for the offense he had been convicted for, but for the supposed one he had never committed or even been tried for, and as a sacrifice to the Theological Whale. When he was permitted to know the facts behind the bars he at once withdrew the application for a pardon, and stood upon the use that his imprisonment might be to liberty for his solace and compensation.

When he left that prison it was in triumph. His reception in New York filled Chickering Hall to overflowing. The Hon. Elizur Wright presided. This Agent always alludes to his victim as the convict, but that term proves too much. By whom convicted? and what for? are the prior questions. Socrates and Christ were both "convicts," and are venerated or worshiped because they were. The same influences that made them convicts convicted Bennett, and with what result in the opinions of free and honorable men the two following letters help to show:

LONDON, N. W., April 14, 1880.

THERON C. LELAND, ESQ., Dear Sir: I have this morning received your favor of the 31st with inclosures, which I duly forward to Mr. Conway and Mrs. Besant.

As our Parliament, to which I have just been elected, meets on the 29th of April, it is simply impossible that I can accept the invitation that you send me.

I trust that Mr. Bennett's imprisonment may be the last of its kind in America. The question is not one of approval or disapproval of the particular pamphlet for selling which Mr. Bennett was convicted. It is that all Freethinkers throughout the world are bound to enter their firmest protest against the endeavor to prevent freedom of discussion on social questions by the misapplication of statutes intended to prevent the circulation of objectionable literature, but which ought never to be allowed to apply to the publication of views which, however extreme or wrongful, ought not by any stretch of malice, to be included under the word "obscene."

If the Hon. Elizur Wright should be your president, as I trust he may, please say how cordially I agree with the stand he has taken in this matter. Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., April 5, 1880.

My Dear Sir: I have received yours of March 30th, inviting me to join in the welcome home which you propose to give Mr. Bennett on his release from prison. You do me great honor. I am obliged to deny myself the gratification of attending the demonstration for a reason which I am sure you will allow to be sufficient. As a general thing I do not care much for demonstrations, but in this instance it becomes everyone to mark in some way his sense of the infamy of the prosecution and sentence of Mr. Bennett. The case involves no abstruse question of law. There is the pamphlet with the passages marked for the jury to consider. Any person of decent intelligence and well-disposed mind can judge the matter as well as the chief-justice of the United States. If the mailing of such a piece of writing as that exposes a person to fine and imprisonment, then everyone holds his liberty at the mercy of a hireling informer. I trust your demonstration will be all that you anticipate. If it were necessary to its success, I would walk the three hundred miles between this place and New York.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

What can exceed the infamy of this Agent in digging up and circulating those letters, old, forgiven, and buried, when Mr. Bennett was helpless in prison?

When he had done all he could to ruin the man he goes and digs all the filth he can out of his privy, in the back yard, and piles it up against his front door; and then publishes a big book to yell over his victory in a way that would shame a savage. As Mr. Parton said, the only answer every lover of liberty and decency could make to such warfare should be to get a dozen new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Liberals took the advice, and more, for they sent Mr. Bennett to their Congress at Belgium with a tour in Europe, and now in replying to this beastly book they will send him around the world. While in England the leading Liberals gave him a reception and the following memorial which also helps to show what such convictions are worth:

"We Seek for Truth."

TO D. M. BENNETT.

In asking you to accept at the hands of the National Secular Society of England this symbol of cordial sympathy and brotherly welcome, we are but putting into act the motto of our Society. "We seek for Truth" is our badge, and it is as truth seeker that we do homage to you to-night.

Without free speech no search for truth is possible; without free speech no discovery of truth is useful; without free speech progress is checked, and the nations no longer march forward toward the nobler life which the future holds for man. Better a thousandfold abuse of free speech than denial of free speech; the abuse dies in a day, but the denial slays the life of the people and entombs the hope of the race.

In your own country you have pleaded for free speech, and when, under a wicked and odious law, one of your fellow-citizens was imprisoned for the publication of his opinions, you, not sharing the opinions but faithful to liberty, sprang forward to defend in him the principle of free speech which you claimed for yourself, and sold his book while he lay in prison. For this act you were in turn arrested and sent to gaol, and the country which won its freedom by the aid of Paine in the eighteenth century, disgraced itself in the nineteenth by the imprisonment of a heretic. The Republic of the United States dishonored herself and not you in Albany Penitentiary. Two hundred thousand of your countrymen pleaded for your release, but bigotry was too strong.

We sent you greeting in your captivity; we rejoiced when the time came for your release; we offer you to-night our thanks and our hope; thanks for the heroism which never flinched in the hour of battle; hope for a more peaceful future, in which the memory of the past pain may be a sacred heritage and not a regret. CHAS. BRADLAUGH, Pres.

Thus has failed this war against Liberals. It has been a delusive triumph. The men he has tried to crush are to-day stronger than ever. The League has doubled the number of its auxiliaries every year, now nearly 250, and they are added to every week. They represent the spirit of liberty which can never be crushed out in Russia, much less in America. It stands like a wall of adamant against this man and his doings. In a popular republic this spirit of liberty must be reconciled to the government and not antagonized. Wise legislators will always secure this result.

For this last reason this Society's mode of enforcing laws can never be a real success. More than half of the people dispute the justice and the right of this amateur authority and rebel against it. Even that poor cripple who gave this Agent the scar on his cheek of which he is so proud, and which has been worth so many thousand dollars to him, felt and feels entirely justified. I asked him how he came to do it. He said he was being dragged to prison by a man who had no right to do it and no warrant. "I had just as much right," said he, "to resist that kidnapper as George Washington had to draw his sword against the enemies of his country."

Laws cannot be enforced safely and beneficially until an entirely secular administration allays this just sense of indignity. As even Carlyle says, "The feeling of injustice is intolerable to man." If the Liberals have done things that cannot be approved in some instances, the spirit of defiance that has been unjustly excited is the excuse. They know from his avowed objects that this Agent is false when he talks about his innocence and pure motives, and pure and lamblike sentiments toward them. They know that he is a narrow-minded, self-interested, unscrupulous bigot, with a dirty affinity that makes him seek the place of an amateur scavenger. That smut bag under his arm is dirty enough, but he carries a worse one in his heart. He is, in the words of the Rev. Sidney Smith, the product of the method he represents and a substantial reason why it should end.

But this Agent says (p. 513), "There is not one word under this law . . . which permits of a construction that can be tortured into any interference with so-called Liberal utterances."

The Liberals know best, and they are justly suspicious when they see "the results not only in the principle" but in the very words and acts of this Agent. For instance, on page 409 he places our country in the same position as the English government with its state church and blasphemy laws, as to breaches of the peace. "Peace," he says, "includes good order and government, and that peace may be broken in many instances without actual force, to wit:

"I. If it be an act against the Constitution or civil government.

"II. If it be against religion" [that is, against what he and his friends or the state church call religion].

"III. If it be against morality" [that is, what he and his friends call morality under their theology].

He then quotes the "test of obscenity" imported by Judge Benedict from England, viz.:

"Whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of the sort may fall."

He says that this test has been "approved by every court of America, when the question has come up under common law."

This is not true. Judge Gildersleeve and others have quoted, but always replaced or modified, this "test," which is not even a test or definition, and was not given as such when it was first used. It was simply an attempt to describe some of the effects of obscenity, used in the English case of The Queen vs. Hicklin, 11 Cox Criminal Cases, p. 19.

AN unjust man is an abomination to the just: and he that is upright in the way is an abomination to the wicked.—Proverbs, xxix, 27.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1881.

America or Russia?

From several recent instances of arbitrary, unwarranted censorship and despotism on the part of our Republican administration the question very naturally arises, Are we living under the rule of American liberty or the tyranny of Russia? There is scarcely a more arbitrary, irresponsible despotism than is now evinced in our postal department. An onerous espionage is set up over our mails; people who hav as much right to the mails as any other person are sent to prison for using the post in a perfectly legitimate manner because of the quality of the matter they properly consign to the mails, and journals that do not quite come up to the moral standard of our despots are crushed and their publishers financially ruined. The very department in which huge thefts occur, and wholesale robbery to the tune of hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars of the people's money, is striking down at a blow the dearest rights of people much better than the very criminals who are wielding this arbitrary power.

A few weeks ago the Health Journal of T. R. Kinget, M.D., of this city, was tabooed by the post-office authorities and a ukase issued that it could not pass through the mail as second-class matter. This is equal to suppressing this useful little periodical. A publisher cannot afford to put a stamp upon every paper weighing a quarter of an ounce, while other and similar publications are carried at two cents a pound, the postage in one instance being thirty-two times as heavy as in the other.

Not long after, Dr. E. B. Foote's Health Monthly, a most valuable publication, was subjected to the same iron rule; and not far from the same time the Agent's Advocate, published by James W. Stillman, Boston, was also suppressed in the same way. The excuse made for these arbitrary and injurious rulings is that these three papers are run in the interests of the publishers and are mere advertising sheets. The falseness of these claims is easily understood when the fact appears that the advertising done in these three journals is not ten per cent of what it is in other periodicals, and that they are published in the interests of the people, containing literature and instructiv matter much above the average periodicals of our country. Besides, what does any person issue a periodical or journal for, unless it is for the profit he may hope to win from it, directly or indirectly? Why are all the health journals published? Why are the Scientific American, the Agent's Herald, the New York Herald, and thousands of other periodicals published? Do they not all contain advertisments of business, both of their own and others? Is it right or American to discriminate between the rich and powerful and the poor and needy? If our government has arrived at the point where it can place its foot upon a weak and struggling enterprise while rich and powerful ones of a similar character are petted and pandered, the quicker it comes to an end the better for the liberties of the people.

The last blow of this postal tyranny has fallen upon another health journal, Dr. Sara B. Chase's Physiologist. And this is not denied the use of the mail because of its advertisments, but upon the ground of its "indecency." On the 20th inst. the following notice was served upon Dr. Chase:

> POST OFFICE, NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.,
> FIRST DIVISION AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
> April 20, 1881.
> Respectfully informing the publisher of the Physiologist that the First Assistant Postmaster-General at Washington, D. C., has instructed this office, under date of the 18th inst., that the Physiologist is hereafter to be excluded from the mails.
> N. P. PEARSON, Postmaster.

It will be seen that this Russian ukase not only rules the Physiologist from the mails as second-class matter, but it prevents it from being sent as third-class matter by the application of stamps. And it not only shuts out the current number but issues the pronunciamento that no future numbers of the Physiologist shall be allowed the use of the mails. Thus the censor of the postal department not only pronounces upon the moral quality of the Physiologists that hav been printed but also upon those not yet printed or written. Is that indeed American liberty or is it Russian despotism? Could Russia go much farther than that?

What are the real facts with the Physiologist? It is an advocate of human welfare and seeks to impart instruction important to the people. It has steadily grown in the estimation of the public and thousands hav learned to hav an affection for it. It is ably conducted. It is entirely moral in character, and the only charge that can be urged against it is because of some information imparted relativ to the size of families—the aiding of mothers to decide how many children they shall bear, or what is known in England as the Malthusian doctrin. By one of the features of the Comstock law, the regulation of the size of families proportionate to the choice, health, and abilities of the parents is a forbidden subject, the indulgence of which, even to the slightest extent, is punishable with fine and imprisonment—with the total ruin of reputation and business.

No matter how well pleased the people of America may be with the Physiologist, no matter how many may wish to take and read it, the censors of the postal department—men who were appointed to do the work of the people, but who hav assumed to be the people's masters and tyrants—hav decided that it shall not circulate by the mail, and that no more shall be published and be permitted to enjoy mail facilities. This is a tyranny utterly subversive of the highest principles of American liberty, and, if persisted in, must destroy the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech.

The mail of our country belongs equally to every citizen of the country; it was organized for the benefit of the entire people, and no one, whether in office or out, has the right to deprive another of his postal facilities. It was not the original object of the mail to establish a censorship over the thoughts and utterances of the people. It is Comstockism that has introduced this most objectionable feature into our postal system, and sad was the day when it was ever accomplished. It is wrong and unamerican for any servant of the people to hav discretionary power to crush any citizen of the country, or to mulct him of his property by depriving him of his just and equal rights. But this is just what is done under this Comstock law. A man who is appointed to serve the people deprives a citizen of his legal rights without process of law, and virtually condemns him and punishes him without arrest, trial, or sentence.

The most guilty criminal has the right to a trial by his peers, and to the privilege of making a legitimate defense, before he shall be sentenced to prison or his property be taken from him. But in this high-handed rule of our post-office censors and despots, Dr. Chase is condemned without a trial, her property is taken from her without a hearing, and she is deprived of her dear rights without a chance to speak a word in her own defense. This is all wrong and is wholly unfitted to a government of freemen. It might do for Russia, but is really wrong in that country, and every other.

If Mrs. Chase has violated any law of the land she should be arrested by due process of law and hav a regular trial by jury. If she is condemned by a jury the penalty incurred by the violation of the law should be imposed upon her. But we protest against this high-handed tyranny of condemning people unheard, and ruining their business enterprises without the least moral or legal authority or the slightest show of justice. No person should be convicted and punished without due process of law.

If magnates of the postal system are to hav this terrible power to exercise as they please, where is it to stop? What class of persons or papers shall be free from this oppression? May not THE TRUTH SEEKER, Truth, the Herald, or Sun, or any other paper be pounced upon when the despots take the notion to make the attack, or they hav some private or intolerant object to subserve? If the principle is right many not political papers of an opposit stripe be struck down at any time when the magnates of the postal system decide to play the tyrant and thus perpetuate their party and power. If the people wink at these things and allow their servants to be despotic and oppressiv, this tyranny is not likely to stop at the bounds now set up, but will be extended till all liberty is destroyed. If the masses will suffer them to be made slaves in one direction it is impossible to say where the limit will ultimately be.

The men who hav done this wrong pretend that it has not been the action of Comstock; but this claim is almost "too thin" to be believed. Every one of the publications named are Liberal and anti-orthodox in character, and every one has made uncomplimentary remarks about Comstock. In keeping with what this man has done in numerous other instances this blow at liberty is very much like one of his striking. If it is not Comstock who has done it, it certainly is Comstockism of the meanest kind. It is done under his law, and is as hateful and obnoxious to the true lover of liberty as any act that can possibly be committed.

It is the numerous exhibitions of this despotic power, this liberty-killing tyranny on the part of the party in office, this unmistakable tendency to centralization and an arbitrary rule, this disposition to crush liberty and destroy private rights and the liberties of the people, together with the grievous wrongs we hav ourselvs suffered at the hands of this party, that aroused us and opened our eyes to the encroachments of the party with which we had acted for a quarter of a century; it was this that convinced us that a change of rule was necessary if the liberties of the people were to be preserved. We gave not a little thought to the subject, and we were strong and honest in our convictions that the ruling party of the country had become corrupt, centralized, aggressiv, and oppressiv. We thought we saw a necessity for a change of dynasty, even if a party was temporarily placed in power which was no better. We dared to giv our thoughts to the public; but this earnest purpose cost us many friends. We all too soon learned the unwelcome truth that there are many so-called Liberals in the country who would see every Liberal paper crushed out, half of the Liberal editors sent to prison, a censorship established in all our post-offices, and the people deprived of their very liberties and rights before they would listen to a word being breathed against the dear Republican party. The truth flared out as vivid as a blazing comet that with many their fealty to Republicanism is stronger than their fealty to liberty and Liberalism.

It was saddening to realize this, to see the very hand kissed by the unsuspecting multitude that was raised to shed its blood, metaphorically speaking. There would hav been a change in the ruling powers of the land had it not been for the powerful rule of a vindictiv and designing man in this city. Had New York city cast her vote in the last election as she had for the previous twenty years, James and Tyner would not to-day hav their clutch on the throats of the people, nor would Mrs. Chase this day be under the feet of those oppressors.

Still we are not fully discouraged. We hav great confidence in the ultimate good sense of the people. When they fully get their eyes open to see the purpose of the party which is the deadly foe of the people, the destroyer of their rights and their liberties, we believe they will pool their issues and take the only means left to retain the blessings which our fathers gave us. Let us still hope that the strong good sense of the people will save the country from Russian despotism.

Col. Ingersoll's Lecture.

On last Sunday evening Booth's theater was packed from top to bottom with a most intelligent and respectable audience to hear the lecture of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, entitled "Some Reasons Why." Every seat was occupied and hundreds were compelled to stand. Some of the city papers make the statement that as high as four dollars were paid for a single seat. It was one of the best lectures the Colonel has ever delivered, and that is saying a great deal. The audience were fully in sympathy with him, and his most radical utterances were applauded over and over again. It is a cause for congratulation that the first people of our city will pay one dollar each and rush by thousands on Sunday evening to hear an ultra-Infidel discourse when hundreds of churches are free. It augurs that the people are surfeited with the senseless and false assumptions of the church and are anxious to hear the words of reason and truth.

The Colonel's discourse lasted one hour and fifty minutes, and the greater part of the rapt audience would hav quietly listened to the same eloquence as much longer. The following brief summary is from the Sun:

"The history of the world," Col. Ingersoll said, "shows that religion has made enemies instead of friends. That one word, religion, paints the horizon of the past with every form of folly. When we pronounce the name religion, we think of six thousand years of hatred and slander and vituperation, of six thousand years of persecution. Strange that those who have loved God most hav loved men least; strange that in countries where there has been the most religion there has been the most agony! That is one reason why I am opposed to what is known as religion. By religion I mean the duties that men are supposed to owe to God, not what man owes to man; not what the father owes to his children; not what the citizen owes to his country; not what the philanthropist owes to the world; but what we owe to some invisible being.

"I raise the question first of all whether any relation can exist between the finite man and the infinit being. Is there any infinit being to whom I owe anything? An infinit being is absolutely conditionless. He cannot want; cannot receive. A finite being cannot give to the Infinit. Can I increase his pain; can I decrease his misery? Does he need my strength? What can I do for him? Nothing. I, for one, do not believe there is a God who gives rain for prayer or sunshine for praise. What can we do? We can help man. We can feed the hungry; free the slave. If I do not comprehend the usefulness of an infinit God, whose fault is it? I am told that we hav the inspired word of God. Nothing but what is false needs to be inspired; the truth will take care of itself. What is inspiration? There is not a thing in nature, from a pebble to a constellation, that tells the same story to any two human beings. A man and his wife saw the sea for the first time at the same moment. She exclaimed, 'Was ever anything more beautiful!' He said, 'I bet you can dig clams right here.' Horace Greeley once lectured on his overland trip. When he came to the big trees I said, Now is the time, if there is any imagination in the old man. I thought of the ages those trees had lived, and of the opportunity he had for description and historic allusion. Horace Greeley took out his pencil and figured that those trees would make just 300,000 feet of inch lumber.

"No two persons looking at the sea, the stars, the flowers, see the same thing," continued the speaker. "Every man gets his little cup full; if he had a larger cup he would get more. Shakspere cannot be understood the same by any two human beings. The impression nature makes upon the brain is natural. It may be deformed, but it will be natural, and in no event will it be supernatural. No human being can conceive the supernatural. There is no person who can think of a thing that has not been suggested from nature. If God had wanted to make a revelation, would he not hav made it in words that we could all understand? The inspiration of the Bible depends upon the ignorance of the gentleman who reads it. The Bible says God's first attempt to people tho world was a failure, and that then God started again with eight persons. Look at the history of the Jews, who, according to the Bible, were the people most favored by Jehovah. They were the most unfortunate people in the world. If the devil could hav written any part of the Bible, would he not hav written those parts that advocate slavery, extermination, murder, polygamy, and the degradation and persecution of women? What worse could a devil hav written? If God wrote those things there is no need of a devil. If the Bible was the work of God, it should contain grander things than any other book; but it does not. It does not compare favorably with the writings of Greeks, Romans, Persians, Hindoos, Arabians. Think of God saying, 'I am a jealous God.' Jealous of what? Of wooden and stone gods! Think of a woman being jealous of a stone woman. God is represented as saying, 'Thou shalt hav no other gods.' Then he believed there were other gods. The Hindoo, the Brahman, and the Christian worship different gods. Let the fight be transferred to heaven and let the gods settle it between themselvs which is the greatest. What was the use of four gospels? There was no need of four stories of the same transaction if one was true. Four human witnesses might vary in their testimony, but not four inspired men. Under the Mosaic dispensation every priest was a butcher. The sacrifices were sheep, because every priest loved mutton. I do not believe in the vicarious atonement. I do not want to go to heaven and feel that I am in the poorhouse of generations. I am blamed for picking the bad things out of the Bible, but why should Jehovah hav put the bad things into his Bible? If Jehovah were to rewrite the Bible he would leave out those defenses of crime. The fact is, we hav civilized our God."

On next Sunday evening, May 1st, the Colonel will deliver another lecture at the Academy of Music, on Fourteenth street, on "The Great Infidels." Doubtless that very capacious edifice will be well filled.

Journalistic Change.

It is announced that John C. Bundy has retired from the Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago. No regrets thereat hav been heard in this quarter, and it is thought the journal will not suffer by the change. He has not added any particular luster to journalism, and perhaps he has given another proof to the truth that malice, slander, and falsehood to break down a competitor are not the surest roads to prosperity and respect. By general consent he will be permitted to retire with that other slanderer and maligner, F. E. Abbot.

It is said that Giles E. Stebbins assumes the control of the Journal. As he is a very goody-goody sort of man, who has for some time "dwelt apart," the change of duties may broaden his views and render his services more useful. May the Journal be a more honorable and useful paper than it has been.

We regret to learn that George Thorne, Esq., a prominent citizen of Clearfield, Pa., and an old and valued friend of The Truth Seeker, has been prostrated for some time with erysipelas in one of his lower limbs. At this time he is much improved, and his friends hope to see him around in a short time. Mr. Thorne, being a prominent and sincere Liberal, commands the respect of all classes in the community where he resides, and is respected as an honest, intelligent, and upright citizen, and is fearlessly trusted and honored by all the community. Religion does not make good citizens, but honesty, integrity, and uprightness of character do, and these Mr. Thorne possesses in an eminent degree. May he be speedily restored to health.

The North American Review for May contains a striking article by the Hon. David Dudley Field on "Centralization in the Federal Government." That our polity is rapidly advancing in the direction of centralization is demonstrated by the author, and his paper will command attention, and be read with interest and profit. The second article is upon the new revision of the Bible, by the Rev. Dr. Schaff, of the American Committee of Revision. Mr. Justice Strong writes of "The Needs of the Supreme Court," and advocates the establishment of a court of appeals, intermediate between the U. S. Supreme Court and the circuit courts. The Hon. George Q. Cannon, the first advisor of the President of the Mormon Church, and delegate to Congress, makes a vigorous defense of "Utah and its People." The question "Shall Americans build Ships?" is considered by Mr. John Roach, the ship-builder, who brings forward a large number of facts to prove that the people of the United States must build ships if they would hold a place among maritim nations. The other articles are "The Life-Saving Service," by the Hon. S. S. Cox; "The Ruins of Central America," by M. Charnay; and finally, an attack on evolution philosophy, entitled, "What Morality Hav We Left?"

Excelsior Songs and Poems. By Robert Snickerson, Trenton, N. J.

These are Radical and Reformatory Songs set to familiar airs.

Revocation, Labor, and Capital. A Review of the Labor Question. By C. C. Comerford.

This pamphlet of 24 pages givs a startling view of the crushing power of monopolies in this country, and points out the road to national success.

Gawky Jim, or Common Sense Theology. A Yankee tale with a Hero but nary Shero. By Rev. Theologicus, D.D. Dr. J. R. Monroe, Seymour, Ind.

This little pamphlet is in the humorous, telling style peculiar to the author. It makes sharp hits at the absurdities of theology and puts the reader in a perfectly good humor.

Mr. Preston to the People.

Fellow Freethinkers: While we have been keeping God from getting into the Constitution, the devil has crept into the post-office. Anthony Comstock has made a cat's-paw of the postal department for the fulfilment of his revenge upon the Physiologist, and has prevented its passage through the mails. The postal power of the United States has been prostituted to the malice of a man publicly pledged to "stamp out Freethought."

We appeal to the Liberal press and Leagues, that can evoke the thunder of that progressiv public opinion which determins the duties and tenures of postmasters and presidents, to rebuke this Comstock outrage and protect our pretty little paper. This unconstitutional order of one odious official in the postal service who presumes to interdict as improper mail matter papers which may be hereafter printed, is simply the outcome of Christian spite. Postmaster-General James will not dare uphold the outrageous order after the burst of indignation now fomenting in the New York daily press and Defense Association shall awaken him at Washington. We are now awaiting his answer. If he does not immediately revoke the infamous order, the matter will at once be brought before the United States Circuit Court by a writ of mandamus, compelling the postmaster to accept the publication. Meantime the Medical Monitor (Dr. Chase, editor, "Better Beings and Fewer of Them," the leading article) is now being printed to take the place of the May number of the Physiologist.

We liv in a land in which the press is irrepressible; and the more Physiologists are prohibited the more Medical Monitors will multiply. It is high time that this inquisitorial influence that has undertaken to stamp out Freethought is itself stamped out.

This is the identical issue that is being so manfully met by Bradlaugh in England. We hav all the guarantees of a glorious triumph under a government such as ours if there be no faltering among our forces. Let Fraternity and Freedom be our watchwords, and the everlasting abolishment of Comstockism and Christianity our work.

Fraternally, S. H. Preston,
Manager of Physiologist.

Elmina's Plea.

Dear Friends of Our Murdered Physiologist: I hope every one of you will feel this wrong and outrage as a personal insult to your highest and purest aspirations; and that you will, one and all, come forward in this our hour of trial and help us to make what now seems a defeat into a glorious victory. We boast of freedom of thought, freedom of opinion, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails. But where are they? What better chance hav we to express our most radical thought than has the persecuted and maligned Nihilist of Russia? If we dare venture to speak thoughts that are in advance of the age we are gagged, fined, and imprisoned, and our substance confiscated and destroyed. The Nihilist strives for liberty to reach his little eminence of light and knowledge, and we try to go onward and upward toward ours — no further on or up for us than is his for him—and each is met by the stern authoritativ voice of the law, and public opinion, and the petty official bigotry of those who should be servants of the people and conservers of their liberty, but who now cry out "thus far and no farther shalt thou go," and if they still persist are relentlessly crushed to earth. Our darling paper is suppressed simply because it told too much truth. It gave too much useful information to the people. One bad man, for selfish purposes of his own, got a bad law enacted for his special benefit, and then got himself invested with almost supreme power to enforce this ambiguous gutta-percha law wherever he saw fit, i.e., wherever there seemed an opening for him to make money, to glorify himself, or to vent his personal malice and spite upon one he disliked. Born under malign influences, this unfortunate individual has in his own personal career of crime worked out the problem as to whether "fewer and better children" was right or wrong. To-day the great mass of the world's thinkers decide that had his mother given birth to one man (child) less the human race would hav been greatly the gainers thereby! This bad man's bad law virtually says to the criminal, the diseased, and the insane, "You must propagate your kind ad libitum," and to the hygienist and philosophic reformer it declares, "If you dare whisper a word that shall hinder this or inform them how to prevent it you shall be fined and imprisoned and your business utterly destroyed."

And even while sorrowfully pitying this poor man for being so badly organized and trained that he can enjoy holding an office that is even meaner than a hangman's, yet I must ask you one and all to help us destroy him. Not take his worse than worthless life, but simply kill him influentially, make him useless and powerless as last year's almanac. Convince the people the world has no work for such an officer. Undo the evil he has done and help us to destroy the last vestige of such wrong, tyranny, and oppression as this bad man's bad law has inaugurated and encouraged. If Elmina has friends, now is the time she hopes they will show their friendship by friendly deeds as well as friendly words! Anxiously but hopefully, Yours, Elmina D. Slenker.

Notice.

I hav received the charter for the Illinois state Liberal League, and to this date I hav the names of twenty-two persons as charter members. A convention to complete the organization of the state League will be held in Farmer City, Dewitt Co., Ill., June 11 and 12, 1881. Able speakers may be expected to be on hand to address the meeting. The life-membership fee to the Illinois state Liberal League is one dollar. This will no doubt be increased after the League is fully organized. Now, friends of the Liberal cause in Illinois, please let us hear from you. I am very much in need of your help and coöperation. Address me at Springfield, Ill.

The Ghost of St. Johns.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just finished reading this unique, sharp, sensible, and cute little book, called "The Ghost of St. Johns," to our family circle, and we all wish it could be read to every school-board in the United States. I am sure not one individual among them all could help acknowledging the truthfulness of the arguments, nor could any one refute them. I hope the little volume will be scattered far and wide, even to the uttermost "corners" of the earth, and that it will kill off and exterminate not only "The Ghost of St. Johns," but all other ghosts and ghostesses who are bad, cruel, wicked, and malicious, or who are so heartless and indifferent as to look coldly on want, woe, and misery, and lift no ghostly finger to relieve it. Dreams of heavens above and hells below, all filled with shadowy invisibles that are utterly useless in all the great arcana of nature, must all be swept away before the telling facts that common-sense writers like friend Babcock place in such a plain and simple way before the reader that the veriest child is compelled to grasp and believe. I hope "all the world and his wife," and "his sisters and his cousins and his aunts" will order this twenty-five-cent pamphlet of you and secure a very lendable little volume, as well as help you by a few more "quarters" to travel around the world.

Thine truly, Elmina.

Snowville, Va., March 6, 1881.

There is a science of legislation, which the details of office and the intrigues of popular assemblies will never communicate; a science, of which the principles must be sought for in the constitution of human nature and in the general laws which regulate the course of human affairs; and which, if ever in consequence of the progress of reason philosophy should be enabled to assume that ascendent in the government of the world which has hitherto been maintained by accident, combined with the passions and caprices of a few leading individuals, may perhaps produce more perfect and happy forms of society than hav yet been realized in the history of mankind.—Dugald Stewart.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Tenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As a specimen of amusing inconsistency your last letter is inimitable. I cannot forbear the pleasure of expatiating upon its beauties in this respect, although I dare not hope to attain to a full understanding of its logic. I have the misfortune to be incapable of receiving modern hypothesis if it is contradicted by express historical testimony, and therefore in my last letter attached but little importance to the vagaries of men like Prof. Newman, Judge Waite, and others of modern times on the authorship of certain books when ancient and in some cases contemporaneous historical testimony refuted them. This is what you call "dextrous dodging," "cavalier attempt with one swoop to throw overboard" their testimony, with the imputation to me of inordinate vanity, etc. I hope the reader will take the pains to really test how much ground my last letter gave for such criticism. But oh! the incomparably modest position of the critic, who, after creating an opportunity for this criticism, can, in objecting to what very few would deny, emphasizes his verdict with all the emphasis of a personal and final pronunciamento. "I PRONOUNCE him" (the Rev. Jno. W. Chadwick), this paragon of self-depreciation says, "better authority upon that subject [the Bible] than fifty thousand of the orthodox clergymen of our country."

And "oh, for the love of laughter!" Mr. D. M. Bennett says my "fling at Dr. Davidson's title of D.D. seems hardly in good taste. Is a degree of scholarship," he asks, "obtained at one of the first institutions of learning in the world a thing of no worth?" Think of it! A theological college admitted by Mr. Bennett to be "one of the first institutions of learning in the world!" And again, "The very fact that he was one of the number selected to write the articles of the Encyclopedia Britannica is a sufficient guarantee of his scholarship and reliability." The shoe happens to be on the other foot this time. The last reference, if I remember rightly, to this encyclopedia was made by myself, when I was rather abruptly told that men than whom "few abler or more honest have arisen" are not expected to have justice done them in it; that it was "gotten up by Christians and to please the Christian class," etc. You certainly have an accommodating way of changing your estimate for the occasion. The whole paragraph is brilliantly ended by the remark that Dr. Davidson's "decision that 'oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge' will probably be allowed to stand as an axiom of truth." I cannot understand how this ever can be an axiom, or has the meaning of the word been altered? You remark:

"In like manner your attempts to disparage Greg, Prof. Newman, and Judge Waite are equally unsuccessful. They have spent many years of their lives in close study of the literature pertaining to the books of the New Testament." If my memory is not treacherous Judge Waite's book is the result of two years' rummaging of the Congressional Library at Washington, and the "many years" of the others would probably narrow down to as limited a period.

As to whether the four canonical gospels were known before A.D. 170, the negative of which you so unnecessarily reiterate, I must merely refer the reader to my previous letters. In the midst of a paragraph of untenable assertions there is one that the canon of the New Testament was not settled until 680, and that the council of that year "considerably reversed" the decisions of previous councils. I ask you for proof of this from some reputable sources, with the instances in which these "considerable reversions" were made, and I beg that it will not be some anonymous friend, however "intelligent" or "learned," or some obscure scribbler whose cacoethes scribendi has made him forget the bounds of modesty and common sense.

You have charged me so often with discourtesy when nothing was further from my thoughts that I am becoming callous. I cannot see, however, why it is uncourteous to affirm that second-hand quotations are unworthy of credence against any one's personal character, especially when offered in proof of a proposition in debate without any clue given by which they may be tested. I am not unaware, however, that many of the remarks you make are as irrelevantly uncourteous as could be written, though I take no offense at them, as I suppose none was intended.

"Let me assure you," you continue, "that when Paul talked about the resurrection of Jesus and of his being seen by the disciples and himself, he meant a spiritual resurrection, that he meant not the body which was born of Mary and was placed upon the cross and which became a mass of dead flesh, he referred to the immortal part—the spirit." I will let you make the attempt, but I cannot have the assurance. Fancy seeing the immortal part—the spirit! Fancy that when Paul spoke of Christ being buried and rising from the dead, he meant his immortal part, his spirit, which had never been buried! Does he not in that very chapter speak of the "body" that is raised, and teach that when Christ comes again those believers who are living will not die, but their bodies will be changed? As to his not believing in Christ's physical ascension, I need no more than quote, "He that descended is the same that also ascended up far above all heavens" (Eph. iv, 10).

I regret to find you so unnecessarily blaspheming. Jehovah is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever;" ever merciful, ever loving, who said even at the time when, to use your caricature of the truth, he "delighted in the sacrifices of thousands of innocent animals," "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. xv, 22), and who in the very opening almost of revelation is willing to save a city whose abominations cannot be named, if five righteous men be found in it.

In conclusion we are favored with a selection from the wisdom of Prof. Robertson Smith, being a quotation from his bunglingly-written article on the Bible in the 9th edition Encyclopedia Britannica. I make no hesitation in calling the professor's article Infidel if he is not himself. What he says is not authority, as his equals in scholarship in the same departments with him disagree with him. I could abundantly substantiate if I thought it worth the time, by quotations from the article, the assertion that it is clumsily written and utterly unreliable. He belongs to a school of criticism that, while quite fashionable now, will probably ere long lose popularity and, like Strauss's mythical theory, be consigned to charitable forgetfulness or be remembered only as purblind folly.

We have reached the end of the external portion of our debate; we now take up the Bible and allow it to speak for itself. In leaving the former I must say that I have been shown no facts that support the theses. As to the origin of Christianity itself there have been several theories offered, but they are only theories and are mutually destructive.

In regard to the authenticity and genuineness of the canon, there has been on your part a determined disposition to insist on hypotheses that are sustained by no proof, but on the contrary are contradicted by all important testimonies. And whatever intellectual ingenuity or scholarship there may be in insisting upon or originating them, without truth to give them moral dignity they sink to mere mental charlatanry. Such, I believe, will be the final verdict of true scholarship upon all such erratic departures from those principles which only can make learning and literary criticism of any scientific value or practical use.

You agree to accept the New Testament account of the words and deeds of Christ as correct for the purpose of a critical examination. There will be no dispute, then, between us that Christ claimed to be divine, that he was the God-man, that he came to die as a savior of the elect—that all accepting him are eternally saved, and all rejecting him are irredeemably lost. This the New Testament teaches. Let us look, then, at your objections to his teachings and conduct. You say: "It cannot be regarded as moral teaching to dissuade men from being industrious, frugal, and provident. The advice to 'take no thought for the morrow' is tantamount to telling people not to prepare for winter, not to sow and plant crops, and for the young and middle-aged to lay up nothing for sickness and old age. It was virtually teaching the worst form of thriftlessness and mendicancy; it is just the doctrine that savages, tramps, and beggars act upon, and is the opposite to what would suit an industrious man, who prudently looks forward and provides for the coming needs. Those are the most praiseworthy and virtuous who spend their time in doing good to those around them, and are careful to make suitable provision for winter, for sickness, and for old age. Those are the most useless and reprehensible who spend their time in idleness, who neither toil nor spin, and make not the slightest preparation for the wants which are sure to come. The first course is productive of comfort, happiness, and virtue, while the latter will surely lead to want, wretchedness, and crime."

It seems difficult to think that any reader would fail to notice that you have entirely overlooked the meaning of Christ's words, and that your interpretation is a caricature. A fuller quotation of the words of the Lord would perhaps show this clearly. "No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things [food and clothing and other necessities] shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow" (Matt. vi, 24–33–34). The idea of the original is that a man shall not be anxiously solicitous about the future. God asks his whole heart, and if he gives him this a man will not be fretting and worrying as to the future. God and the world are opposite interests; what is the wisdom and delight of the former is tiresome folly to the latter. But unto God belongs all power, and if I can trust God with my soul I can also trust him with my bodily wants. The text does not forbid frugality nor industry, but its object is to teach against distrust in God and a desire to attain wealth by means that are contrary to God. To the soul that is entirely surrendered to God, spending its time in his service, he of course pledges himself to sustain it. An earthly employer would do the same; when a servant is bound to a master the latter agrees to feed and clothe him so that he can perform his master's service untrammeled by fear or anxiety. As a proof of how completely God fulfils his promises, let me direct your attention to Mr. George Müller and the Bristol Orphanage. Many hundred orphans are trained in this house, the funds to build and maintain which were derived without any personal solicitation of men. Between three and five millions of dollars have come into Mr. Müller's hand in answer to his prayers without any application, as I have said, from any quarter on his behalf to outsiders. Oftentimes he has not known where to obtain the next meal for his orphaned charges, yet he has never wanted. This is a practical carrying out of the teachings Christ here inculcated. Your objection is founded on a misunderstanding of the import.

"2. A wise and faultless teacher would not instruct people to cut off their right hands and to pluck out their eyes. If an instructor should carry out this practice it would be most foolish and immoral."

Christ was speaking in the allegorical manner so customary in oriental counties, and yet if a man's eye led him to gaze upon sights which aroused sinful feelings in his heart that would lead to everlasting destruction or if it were necessary to cut off his hand to control his evil, a wise and faultless teacher would most assuredly instruct as Christ did. Are you willing to record yourself as upholding that it is better that the whole body be cast into hell than that a man should enter into heaven previously having plucked out his eye or cut off his hand? Of course you can deny the existence of hell, but you promised to criticise from a New Testament standpoint, and Christ believed that there was such a place of torment. Thus the second objection falls as pointless as the first.

"3. To pay a premium for theft is far from good morality. The injunction to give the cloak to him who stole the coat just amounts to this. It is a premium for crime."

The teaching of Christ is that vengeance belongs to God; the servant of God is not to defend himself, but to place his case in the hands of God. The time will come when righteous judgment will be awarded, and the Almighty certainly has a moral right to declare the conduct proper for his servants. The obvious meaning of this teaching is that inasmuch as God is dealing in grace, not in judgment, his servants should do likewise.

"4. It did not indicate the highest morality or excellence when he said he came not to bring peace, but a sword. Few are so ignorant of goodness as to think war is more productive of virtue than peace."

Christ did not mean that his object in coming was to bring a sword instead of peace, but the contrary; "the son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." He briefly summed the history of a fallen humanity in its enmity to infallible goodness, that when the latter came to the earth men warred against it; men would not receive the light because their deeds were evil. The history of the last eighteen centuries proves how true Christ's words were.

"5. It was not virtue nor morality that prompted him to advise his disciples to sell their garments and buy a sword. Garments are useful to protect the body, but swords are to inflict injury upon others."

Is not the above almost too childish to seriously answer?

"6. It is very questionable morality that moved Jesus to command his followers to hate fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and children? Other great teachers had preached love instead of hatred.

"7. A truly kind and genial personage would not call a woman a dog when she asked him to do a kindness to her sick child."

Christ, as you probably know, merely varied the form but not the idea of his words, "If any man love father or mother more than me he is not worthy of me." As to the Syrophœnician woman, she occupied in regard to her station nationally before God compared with the Jews the position of the house-dog to the children. Christ, after having tested her faith, shows the veiled love and pity of his heart in granting her request and commending her faith.

"8. It is not an indication of superlative excellence and benignity to say, 'Those, mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me.'"

These are the closing words of a parable of the final judgment of the wicked. Is it unrighteous for God to judge and punish his apostate, rebellious creatures?

"9. Is it not the mark of benignity, kindness, and love to send souls to everlasting flames because they could not believe what they were told they must believe. 'Believe or be damned' has been the authority for all the persecution and killing for not believing right that the church practiced for centuries."

It is not that man cannot believe so much as that he will not believe. Unbelief is the result of a man's wilful, perverse hatred of God; the heart sins and rejects long before the head. "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light." "Ye will not come unto me," says the Savior, "that ye might have life." Men do not reject because God does not furnish ample evidence, but because they abhor him and his restraint.

"10. It was not especially truthful in him to promise his disciples that they should sit on twelve tbrones over the children of Israel. It remains unfulfilled."

Because it is as yet unfulfilled is no proof that it is untruthful.

"11. It was hardly kindness that prompted him to curse whole cities because they would not receive his disciples."

I suppose you refer to his telling the disciples that cities which rejected the disciples rejected him, and it would be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for them. It was justice, although he did not curse them, but merely declared what the reward would be of their contemptuous rejection of God's offered mercy.

"12. It was more immoral than moral to instruct his disciples to take the ass belonging to another without consent.

"13. It would not be considered just the proper thing now for a man to take a lot of his followers with him through a neighbor's cornfield on Sunday and pluck the corn that belonged to another.

"14. It was an exhibition of ignorance, impatience, and foolish anger to expect to find figs on a tree in the winter, and, when disappointed, to angrily curse the tree and kill it."

How do you know he did not have the owner's consent to borrow the ass? Besides, the Lord God has a sovereign right to take and use anything he chooses. The stealing of corn from a cornfield now is very different to gathering that which was always left, as it was in ancient times, for the stranger and the poor to use as they pleased. His embittered enemies who accused him on this occasion of breaking the Sabbath had too much common sense to accuse him of stealing.

"15. He did not forgive the woman who was caught in the act of adultery upon the highest moral ground—'Let him that is without sin cast the first stone.'"

This is foolishness. The record does not state upon what ground he forgave her. He refused to condemn her to be stoned, and, releasing her, bade her "sin no more."

"16. It was the spirit of severity that moved him to say, 'Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my father which is in heaven.' A spirit of revenge is here to be seen.

"17. It was not good manners nor gentlemanly conduct, when he had accepted an invitation to dine with a man, and, when spoken to for not following the Jewish custom of washing the hands before eating, to call the host a fool, a hypocrite, etc.

"18. It was not nice in him to denounce people as fools, hypocrites, blind guides, devourers of widows' houses, serpents, vipers, children of hell, etc.

"19. It was not mild, gentle, just, nor lamb-like in a furious manner to upset the tables of the money-changers, who were following a life-long custom by selling doves, etc., in the temple to those who wished to perform the rite of sacrifice, and then rudely beating and flogging them with thongs and ropes' ends and rudely driving them out of the temple, where they had as much right as himself."

In regard to No. 16, how do you know it was a spirit of severity? He merely told the truth. In the next objection, he detected and exposed the hypocrisy of the Pharisees who were assembled. The record does not say that he called his host a fool, etc. As to No. 18, it is simply nonsense. If they were hypocrites, etc., they certainly deserved to be exposed. Why is it that the latest phases of Infidelity cannot believe that a perfect being is not just at one time, merciful at another, and noble at another, but has all these qualities combined at all times, and that they do not clash. You alter your objection to suit the occasion. If it is undeniably just, you say it is not merciful; if it is an act of pure mercy, you characterize it as not just, etc.

In No. 19 again you exaggerate the record. There is no hint of his "furious manner," "rudely beating and flogging," etc. Neither is it true that the traders had as much (or any) right as himself, considering that he was the Lord God.

"20. It was not truthful to declare that the end of the world should come, and he be seen in glory in the heavens before that generation should pass away, and before some of those present had tasted death. That prediction was a falsehood."

Of course, I recall the verse you have caricatured. He did not say the world should end, nor that he should be seen in glory in the heavens, etc. If you quote the verse literally, you will not find any falsehood in him. The word "generation," I might observe here, is used in the sense of race—the Jewish race. The "this generation" to which he refers has not yet passed away.

"21. He did not utter the truth when he said those who believed on him should be able to take up poisonous serpents and drink any deadly thing without harm. Can you who believe in him so strongly do this?

"22. In hundreds of thousands of cases the believers in Jesus have laid their hands upon the sick without being able to cure them, though he promised they should be able to do so."

He did not promise these things to happen in every case. They have happened, the former in apostolic times and perhaps often later; of the latter I will quote you an instance that may surprise you. I believe it would happen universally if Christians had the faith.

Mr. (now Prof.) F. W. Newman was once a member of the missionary staff at Bagdad. On his return from Persia in 1832 in company with the celebrated Dr. Kitto he fell dangerously sick, and his companions gave up all hopes for him. At last one of them thought of the promise in James v, 14, and they anointed him with oil and prayed over him, and he was marvelously restored to health. Alas! that one to whom the Lord had been thus gracious should so sadly apostatize from the faith that then saved him.

"23. It is not correct to give the highest credit to believing when it is not a matter of choice. No one can believe unless his reason is convinced, and then he cannot help it."

Unbelief is always in the heart before it is in the mind. It is a constant sarcasm with you the credit that the Bible gives to belief; there is no credit in it, for it is God only who can impart it; nor is it worth anything of itself. The Christ to whom it is likened is the Savior, not faith.

"24. It was not the highest wisdom to promise frail, fallible man that he should hold the keys of heaven, and that whomsoever he bound on earth should be bound in heaven, and whomsoever he loosed on earth should be loosed in heaven."

I will confess that I am not altogether clear as to the entire meaning of this gift. It is not, however, as you assert, "the keys of heaven," but of the kingdom of heaven—a different thing—and it was to Peter. If you will read the book of Acts carefully you will notice that Peter gives admission into the kingdom—the outward professing thing—first to the Jews, then to the Gentiles. One would have thought that the great apostle to the Gentiles would have been the instrument to unlock the door of the kingdom to them, but no, the keys had been given to Peter and he it was who admitted the first Gentiles. The binding and loosing was afterward given to all the apostles, who, while sometimes "frail, fallible men" were at other times inspired, infallible men; and it was at such times that their actions on earth were confirmed in heaven.

"25. He did not speak truly when he promised his followers that whatever they asked for, believing, they should receive. This has been falsified in millions of instances."

It is as necessary to use common sense in interpreting the scripture as in reading any other book. Christ did not mean—and it would be a curious mind that would suppose he did—that God would grant a sinful prayer, offered with however great sincerity. You cannot prove, however, that any prayer offered according to the conditions imposed by Christ was ever left unheard and unanswered.

I have reviewed half of your objections. In your eagerness to multiply them you have made several repetitions, and they are all written in the same hap-hazard style. There is not, as far as I can perceive, one weighty objection in the whole series. Some are absolutely false, others exaggerated and coarse in their terms, and all are puerile in the extreme. Of the remaining ones uncriticised, take the twenty-ninth as a specimen:

"He did not give a clear and truthful reason why taxes or tribute should be paid, when it was because Cæsar's image was on the coin, saying, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

Let us compare it with the record.

"Then went the Pharisees and took counsel how they might entangle him in his talk. And they sent out unto him their disciples with the Herodians, saying, Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, neither carest thou for any man, for thou regardest not the person of men, tell us, therefore, what thinkest thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar or not? But Jesus perceived their wickedness and said, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Show me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render, therefore, unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. When they had heard these words they marveled and left him and went their way" (Matt. xxii, 15–22).

Who does not see in this answer evidence of unusual wisdom? The Pharisees held from certain teachings in the laws of Moses that it was unlawful to pay tribute to the heathen emperor. The sycophant Herodians taught the contrary. The question was pregnant with danger. Had Christ answered simply in the affirmative, the Pharisees would have represented him as a foe to the people and an offender against the laws of Moses. If his reply had been a negative, he would have been delivered to the Roman governor as a rebel against the authority of Cæsar and a mover of sedition. How beautifully and wisely does he discover their wickedness and compel them to testify against themselves, and how sadly bigoted must be the heart that cannot perceive it!

The life of Christ as written in the gospels is unique—it is the central figure of all history. The greatest minds of the present day cannot compose a narrative as affecting as the unlettered records of some ancient Galilean fisherman—nor is the human mind capable amid all the wealth of its genius of delineating another such character as sheds undying luster on their pages. Before his all other lives shrivel into insignificance, all other kingdoms wane, all other glories fade. And to the future it may not be inappropriate to apply the glowing tribute of the great French Infidel Renan:

"Whatever may be the surprises of the future, Jesus will never be surpassed. His worship will grow young without ceasing; his legend will call forth tears without end; his suffering will melt the noblest hearts; all ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born greater than Jesus."

Sincerely yours, G. M. Maie.

The Failure of Mr. Beecher's Revival Effort, and the Reason Why.

Mr. Beecher's announcement some time ago that he was going to start a revival in his church at Brooklyn confirmed me in the opinion I hav entertained of him for many years, that he was a poor logician. When he told the world that he had rejected the doctrin of eternal hell fire, and of the existence of the devil as the Lord's stoker to supply the flames with fuel, he ought to hav known that it would be the death of all future revivalism, and that he must keep his pews full by preaching about the beauties of holiness in the abstract, and the exceeding sinfulness of sin in the concrete. A burning hell and a devil are to the church, not only in its revivals to save sinners, but to the very existence of itself, what steam is to a locomotiv engin. Here is an engin organized to go and to pull a train of passenger cars on a railway. It is in complete order as a piece of machinery, but it stands on the rails cold. The engineer rings the bell to warn people to clear the track, and the conductor sings out, "All aboard." But the train don't move an inch! The passengers put their heads out of the windows to see what is the cause of the detention, and wonder why, after so much bell-ringing, there is no motion of the wheels. The reason is that there is no steam in the boiler. It is not the engin, nor the bell, nor the conductor, that makes the cars move, but the steam, and the fire which generates it. These are the motiv powers, and without them the engin can make no headway.

So in Mr. Beecher's revival efforts. How could he possibly make any headway without the aid of hell and the devil? People join the church, attend the prayer-meetings, pay the preacher, and take the sacrament, because they believe that these are the means of escaping from hell fire when they die. But if there be no hell fire, and no devil, why should they be alarmed? Why should they suffer all their lives the dreary inanities of prayer-meetings, and the benumbing influence of dull sermons, and submit to taxations and clerical dictations, when they could save money, self-respect, and freedom of conscience and action, and be a great deal better off by treating the whole system of Christianity as a swindle?

The Bible calls the preachers of the gospel "fishers of men," and the finger-ring of the popes of Rome has the seal of "the fisherman," because by his agents, the priests, the pope catches so many fish in his net. So Mr. Beecher, like his illustrious predecessor, said to the public last winter, "I go a-fishing." He cast his net over one side of the ship, but every dip he made was a water-haul. Then he tried the other side, and, if the papers can be believed, he caught one gudgeon in the shape of a poor spinster. Even the Brooklyn women, so credulous and priest-ridden, are getting sensible enough not to make efforts to escape from the wrath to come when they know from Mr. Beecher's admission that there is no wrath to come. No! no! every clear-minded man can see that the corner-stone of the church, and all its claims, is the doctrin of hell fire—that you can neither long run the church itself, much less a revival of religion, without the bug-a-boo of hell fire and the devil.

But what a reflection this abortion at revivalism is on Mr. Beecher's character both as a logician and an honest man! How contemptible is his vacillation!—one while knocking hell out of the bottom of his theology, and another while pretending to act as if he believed in hell, and that a revival was the way to escape from its eternal fires. "Frailty, thy name is" Beecher! A. B. B.

Our Eleventh Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I am not sure but your facetiæ will do to rank with your arguments and your proofs. If you deem that severe upon your facetiæ I beg to assure you it is the best I can do from exhibitions up to the present writing.

I am getting a little discouraged with your incorrigibility, but still the love of truth urges me on. After all the proofs, pagan, Christian, and Infidel, which I have lavishly dealt out to you, it is most saddening to still hear you talk about "the vagaries of men like Prof. Newman, Judge Waite, and others of modern times on the authorship of certain books when ancient, and in some cases contemporaneous, historical testimony refuted them." The dishonesty of your style of argument is most apparent. There has never appeared an abler, sounder, and more learned historical work than "Supernatural Religion," by Prof. Newman, and no one has been able to disprove the facts he has adduced about the wholly unhistorical and unreliable claims of the Christian religion. Men of "vagaries" and unsound mind do not fill the professorship chairs of the London University. Prof. Newman has filled one of those chairs, and as creditably, probably as any man ever did. A weak man, an unreliable man, cannot produce such works as he has written. Still you feel competent to disparage him, and snap your fingers at him as though he were unworthy of your attention. It is the same with W. Rathbone Greg, Judge Waite, and others whom you affect to despise. Sounder and more learned, candid, and reliable works than these have written do not exist. Still you can denounce them as dealers in "vagaries." But where is your proof that sets aside the facts they have adduced that there is no historical authority that such a person as Jesus ever lived, that the four gospels were not written by the persons whose names they bear, and that the gospels were unknown before the latter part of the second century? If you have any such proof please produce it and let us see what it amounts to. Your failure to produce such proof must be taken as a confession that there is none.

Your want of fairness is shown in your taunting Judge Waite with "rummaging" for two years in the Congressional Library, as though he was thereby guilty of some impropriety. If it had been a Calvinistic clergyman who had thus passed his time in reading the books of that library, you would have spoken in quite another style, and probably would have reverently mentioned his extensive research, or his learned investigations; but as it was an unbeliever or Infidel who was doing the investigating, he was "rummaging." In this cavalier and unfair manner you endeavor to toss aside the excellent testimony I have adduced. If they do not bow down and acknowledge your pet system, or if they state any facts damaging to it, you flippantly denounce them and speak of them in contemptuous terms; and when nothing else can be said, you asperse them as "Infidels," which, after all, is not so much of a stigma as you suppose. A man who has the intelligence and the bravery to be an Infidel or unbeliever, unsubmissive to what he conceives to be the false and miserable system of Christianity, is deserving of honor and respect. To doubt the excellence of that system which has required more falsehood to sustain it, and has caused more human wretchedness—the greatest amount of mental anguish and physical suffering, a much more profuse shedding of human blood, and wholesale destruction of human life—than any other system of religion—yes, than all other systems combined; to uphold it, to doubt that system, I say, is but natural and commendable. They who do so can well submit to the epithet "Infidel," for they are truthful and the bravest and grandest men of our time. For nearly fifteen hundred years to be a "heretic," a "skeptic," an "unbeliever," or an "Infidel," has been a serious charge indeed, as hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, in the past centuries have found to their sorrow. Yes, millions have laid down their lives in defense of the right to doubt; to entertain views of their own; to be an "Infidel." But things are gradually changing; unbelievers are rapidly increasing in numbers; the most learned of our age are becoming heretics to the church, and Infidelity is growing comparatively fashionable. The block, the stake, the fagot, with the rack, the pincers, the wheel, the pulley, and all the other persuasive Christian appliances, have been removed, and it has got so now that a man can express aloud his doubts of the truth and excellence of the Christian system without his liberty, property, and life being forfeited and taken from him.

Oh, yes, Infidels are coming up; but I trust they will never show the same infernal and murderous intolerance to their opponents which Christians for centuries have showered with a heavy hand. I trust they will enlighten the earth, increase knowledge among men, and dispense happiness to the sons and daughters of humanity, and not fill the nations with shrieks and groans, and cover the earth with human gore as their Christian enemies have done.

I think I can say I have not aspersed your authorities unless I was able to disprove them. I have even quoted numbers of Christian writers, and when I have thus shown that they bear testimony in favor of the truth as I see it, you have also turned upon them as if to rend them, as in the case of Dr. Davidson and Prof. W. Robertson Smith, because the one uttered the undeniable truth that "oral tradition is the chief fountain of Christian knowledge," and that thus all knowledge of Christianity in the first two centuries is fragmentary; the other that "the analysis of the New Testament is the resurrection of early parties in the church, each pursuing his own tendency by the aid of literary fiction;" and again that "we do not possess any historical notice of the existence of the original copies of the New Testament writings," and still again that "glosses or notes originally written in the margin very often ended by being taken into the text, and that the explanatory words were torn from their proper context and came to be regarded as part of the original." This truthful statement of a learned and honest man is damaging to your claims, and is evidently as distasteful to you as it was to your church brethren in Scotland, who tried him for heresy, and hoped to expel him from their communion, but which they were unable to do; and you exhibit the lack of grace and truth to call his "a bunglingly-written article," and because he tells the truth you denounce his production as "Infidel, if he is not himself." It is not bunglingly written, and the parts quoted are true if they are Infidel.

I regret to see that you exhibit the same unfair tendencies shown by all your fellow-defenders of a defective system. Personally you are genial and apparently fair and candid, but when with your pen you try to defend your faulty system of faith you manifest that same want of fairness, that same effort to hide the truth and hold up falsehood in its place, that your brethren of the church have ever exhibited. It speaks very badly for a system when unfairness, aspersion, and misrepresentation have to be brought to its defense. If it will not stand the light of truth and fact and fairness its case is hopeless indeed. Let me again assure you that denouncing able and truthful writers as "no scholars," "rummagers," "reverend critics," "bungling writers," and "Infidels," will not serve to overthrow the truths they have stated, and will have but slight effect in propping up a composite but false system already tottering with age and imbecility. It is indeed a pity that the system and its defenders are reduced to the necessity of resorting to defamation, unfairness, and abuse.

You take umbrage at my opinion that the Rev. Mr. Chadwick is better authority upon the Bible than fifty thousand of the clergymen of our country. But I cannot change that opinion. If any candid person will read his "Bible of To-day" and not come to the conclusion that he is better read upon the history and character of the books composing the Bible than are three-fourths of American clergymen then I am very much mistaken. There are indeed very few of the clergy who possess the information to produce such a work. Your styling him a townsman of your own, a Unitarian, or even an "Infidel," will not render nugatory the great work he has accomplished. His book is one which will live for a century to come, and will doubtless be much more esteemed than those who asperse him now.

I notice you do not again come to the relief of silly old Father Irenæus, who discovered the reason why God decided to have four gospels. Possibly it is cruel on your part to abandon him. It has been asked, Why were four gospels necessary? If God wished a gospel written giving the facts of his son's visit to the earth and his ignominous death, why should the story be told more than once? One multiplication table has proved sufficient; four multiplication tables have been entirely unnecessary. Why not make as many copies of the one correct gospel as mankind needed? Is not one truthful and perfect narration of a series of incidents enough? What can be gained by telling the story four times over and in four different ways? And what connection can there be between a truthful narrative and four winds, four corners of the globe, or cherubim with four faces? If you are pretty good at solving divine problems I wish you had told us how much wine, according to John and Irenæus, each vine was to produce. You will remember each vine was to have 10,000 shoots, each shoot 10,000 branches, each branch 10,000 twigs, each twig 10,000 clusters, each cluster 10,000 grapes, and each grape twenty-five measures of wine. Everything about this remarkable statement is pretty definite save the "measures." In our terminology a measure is an uncertain quantity. Some say it is equal to six puncheons, but that would be far too much wine for a single grape to produce. John and Irenæus could hardly have meant that every grape should produce that much wine. Perhaps he meant a gallon; it could not have been less than a pint. Let us see, then, if a single "measure" is a pint, how much wine each vine was to produce in that good time coming. According to my calculation each vine would produce 312,500,000,000,000,000,000 gallons of wine, or 7,812,500,000,000,000,000 barrels of forty gallons each, or 1,302,083,333,333,333,333 hogsheads of two hundred and forty gallons each. Oh, what a quantity of wine! What a quantity of casks it would require to contain it! What great numbers of people it would require to manufacture the casks! If a man could turn out one cask per day, and if at that time there were on the earth 300,000,000 men capable of making one cask per day, it would require them to work 4,340,277,777 days to make them, or 14,467,592 years of three hundred working days each. If those 300,000,000 men had commenced at the time Adam and Eve were placed in the Garden of Eden, 6,000 years ago, to make casks to hold the wine that one of Irenæus's vines should produce, they would, down to this time have made but 5,400,000 casks, and and would to-day have the snug little number of 296,683,333,333,333,333 casks still to make, requiring only 14,461,592 years to finish the job. What would became of all the wine of that one vine during that little interim, to say nothing of the wine of all the other vines, I will leave you and Father Irenæus to settle, when you have the truths of the gospels satisfactorily arranged. One could easily imagine that the pious Father was rather fond of wine.

His wheat story is nearly as extravagant; he said, "In like manner shall every grain of wheat produce 10,000 ears, and every ear 10,000 grains, and every grain 10,000, pounds of pure white meal." That is the largest yield of wheat I have ever heard of; every grain should produce 1,000,000,000,000 pounds of flour or 5,000,000,000 barrels of 200 pounds each, making a reasonable allowance for bran. It would indeed take considerable grinding to convert the product of one grain of that kind of wheat into flour. If a man had a lively flouring mill with ten runs of stones, and each run should turn out ten barrels per day, it would require 50,000,000 days or 166,666 years of three hundred working days each to grind the wheat of that one plant. If Father Adam had had a mill of that kind, and he had undertaken the contract of grinding the product of one grain of that wheat, and he had kept it going constantly down to the year, A.D. 1881, he would have some 180,000,000 barrels ground, and would have to work only about 160,666 years more to complete the contract. Let us imagine for a mo- that the crop from that one grain of wheat is all ground, barreled, and loaded on cars to take it to market. Let us suppose that each car would contain one hundred barrels of flour and that each car required a space of twenty feet; 50,000,000 of cars would be necessary and they would form a train 1,000,000 miles in length, or forty times around the globe—probably ten thousand times more flour than has been produced in all the world for five thousand years! How would some of our Western farmers like to get hold of some of that wheat of St. John and St. Irenæus? If all the farmers of the United States could come in possession of one grain of it and sow it and harvest the crop they would never need to raise any more wheat. It would serve the world for many thousand years, and oh, what a time for dumplings and slapjacks poor hungry mortals would have to be sure!

And this Christian Father, Irenæus, who pretended to quote this wine and wheat story from St. John, is the one to whom we are indebted for the statement that four gospels were inspired from heaven; and why heaven concluded to have four gospels, and no more and no less. He is one of the principal authorities we have to depend upon for our gospel knowledge. He was the first to mention anything about our four gospels, and whether his word is worth a straw I will leave it with you and our readers to decide. If he was as good at writing gospels as he was at telling wine and wheat stories, he could easily have gotten up our four little gospels of the New Testament, and had considerable time left for epistles, revelations of beasts, dragons, etc. Ah, the Christian world hardly knows how much it owes to Father Irenæus for our blessed New Testament which is soon to appear in an improved and brand-new version. Let me say to you if you or any of our readers should have any doubts about the quantity of wine and flour described by Irenæus, they should remember that "all things are possible with God," and that "to doubt is to be damned."

I will not contend with you about what kind of a resurrection Paul believed in. I will let you have your own way with Paul. If it will make you happy to have it go that it was the body of Jesus which he saw while on the way to Damascus, and that bodies of flesh, blood, and bones are to be taken up into heaven, that flesh and blood are to inherit the kingdom of heaven, I will let you enjoy that belief, though I do not think that Paul believed any such thing. Now that I have yielded so much to your pleasure, may I again ask you to point out where Paul makes any mention of Jesus being taken bodily up into heaven? And if he did not say anything about that or Christ's wonderful miracles, will you please tell us why he did not? Was it not probably because the story of those things had not then been written, and because Irenæus & Co. had not yet discovered the four canonical gospels?

You seem to grieve because I "so unnecessarily blasphemed Jehovah." I was not aware I blasphemed him any more than I did Brahma, Ormuzd, Jove, and Mumbo Jumbo (I hope they will not be offended at me for joining his name with theirs). True, I did speak of the improvement that had taken place in his character, but I did not dream that was blaspheming him. You say he is ever the same, "ever merciful, ever loving." Indeed! I did not know it. Was it loving and merciful in him to order fifty thousand women put to death in cold blood and as many little male infants, and that the female infants, little girls, and youthful virgins who had never lain with man be kept alive for the use of his soldiers and priests? You cannot deny that being in the Bible. Was it love and mercy that prompted him to command that whole nations of his own offspring should be exterminated by the sword, that women should be ripped up, and little innocent children put to death? You will hardly deny this being in the Bible. Was it loving and merciful in him to authorize human slavery, that his peculiar people might purchase a women from neighboring nations—also his own children—and make them slaves forever? Was it because he was so loving and merciful that caused him to command men to slay their brothers because they changed their religious views, saying, "Thou shall not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him, neither shalt thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people, and thou shalt stone him with stones that he die?" Was it love and mercy that made him give this command? "Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and all the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword." If even the people had done wrong, was it merciful and just to kill the cattle on account of it? Was it an instance of Yahweh's loving mercy when he gave this order, "When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, them proclaim peace unto it. And it shall be, if it make the answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and shall serve thee. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it; and when the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thy hands thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword; but the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies which the Lord thy God hath given thee. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nation. But of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth; but thou shalt utterly destroy them?" (Deut. xx, 10–17). If you deem that a loving and merciful command, your ideas of mercy are unlike mine. If it might be considered merciful to the Jews, was it not a little hard upon those who were to be utterly put to death, and who were equally his children?

Was it loving and merciful in this imaginary being, whom you so adore, to give this imperative command, "Suffer not a witch to live?" That very order, written in the name of your God, has been the authority for putting to the most cruel and shameful deaths hundreds and thousands of the most unfortunate of human beings. Was it loving and merciful in him to smite with sudden death over fifty thousand men whose only offense was to exercise a harmless curiosity to look into an old box in which it was pretended an infinite God made his abode? Was it loving and merciful in Yahweh to smite unto death with a sore pestilence seventy thousand men who had done nothing to excite his ire, but because his favorite had done just what he (Yahweh) moved him to do in numbering the people? Was it loving and merciful in him to send again and again pestilence, famine, war, carnage, and bloodshed upon poor unfortunate human beings, for frivolous pretexts, and for acting out the very natures he had created them with? If all these thousands of instances are specimens of his loving mercy, let it be distinctly understood that I want no share in them and wish to keep away from him as far as possible.

It is in vain for you to pretend now that Yahweh was not fond of the sacrifice of rams, bullocks, and goats. It is the sheerest audacity and perversion in you to attempt it. Did not Abraham sacrifice animals to Yahweh again and again? Did not Isaac and Jacob sacrifice animals over and over again? Did not Moses at the command of Yahweh repeatedly enjoin this bloody sacrifice? When this godly man Moses, who always moved at the command of Yahweh, established the worship of Yahweh at the foot of Mount Sinai, about the first thing he did was to sprinkle and baptize all the congregation with bullock's blood. And this bloody command was said to be transmitted from heaven. "Then shalt thou kill the ram and take the blood and put it on the tip of the right ear of Aaron and upon the tip of the right ear of his sons, and upon the thumb of their right hand, and upon the great toe of their right foot, and sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about, and thou shalt take the blood that is upon the altar and of the anointing oil, and sprinkle it upon Aaron and upon his garments, and upon his sons and upon the garments of his sons with him" (Ex. xxiv, 20, 21). When Aaron and his sons were thus besmeared with bullock's blood and grease they were supposed to be in a very acceptable condition to worship Yahweh.

On the occasion of the consecration of priests an extra amount of blood was demanded. Every day a bullock and two lambs were to be killed, besides all the individual sacrifices, and in all cases the blood was to be sprinkled upon the altar. On the holy Sabbath a double amount of animal life must be taken and a double amount of blood strewn around. At the new moon, or the three great festivals, the great day of atonement, and the feast of the trumpets, two bullocks and seven lambs were usually demanded. For a sin offering the blood was sprinkled seven times before the veil of the sanctuary, a portion of it put on the horns of the altar of incense, and the rest poured at the foot of the altar of sacrifice. Did you ever think of it, what bloody butchers the priests of Yahweh must have been, as it was their religious duty to slay the thousands of animals that Yahweh demanded, and how they must have been constantly covered with blood from head to foot? Did you ever imagine how it must have smelled, especially in hot weather, about those holy places of Yahweh's worship, with the blood of those numerous animals poured and scattered about, decomposing and stinking in the warm atmosphere? Verily, if Yahweh was invisible to his worshipers, it would seem they ought to have been able to smell him.

And what an extra sweet and holy time it must have been when Solomon dedicated his temple to Yahweh after he had spent tens of millions of dollars in building the house to his God! At the introduction of the ark into the temple the blood and flesh of the slain animals must have been most repulsive save to Yahweh and his delicate worshipers. In 2 Chronicles v, 6, it is stated that sheep and oxen were sacrificed in such quantities that they could not be told and numbered for multitude. In the seventh chapter we are informed that at the dedication of the temple twenty-two thousand oxen and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep were slain for the pleasure of Yahweh. What a bellowing and bleating there must have been among the poor cattle and sheep, who could not realize that they were being killed for the benefit of a god of love and mercy! How the pools of blood must have stood on the floor of the holy place, and how the rivers of the sanguinary fluid—the life of the thousands of helpless dumb animals—must have constantly run off into the valley of Hinnon! How the priests must have looked like bloody butchers, and how every feeling of mercy and pity must have been crushed out of their breasts as they unfeelingly watched the struggles of the dying animals around them!

Is it strange that the deity who delighted in this bloodshed, and who was placated by the wholesale sacrifice of animal life, should afterward demand the blood of his own beloved son in order that he might be brought into a mild, forgiving humor toward some others of his human children? Is it strange that in one part of the book called his word this bloody passage appears, "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God. . . . Without shedding of blood there is no remission?" (Heb. ix, 13, 22).

Thus blood, blood, blood, runs all through the Bible. Appropriately did the Rev. Mr. Pentecost, the revivalist, say, "If you would take a camel's-hair pencil, as I have done, dip it into a bottle of carmine ink, and pass it lightly over those passages of scripture from Genesis to Revelation that make reference to blood in connection with all that refers to salvation, forgiveness, redemption, sanctification, glory, and everything of that kind, you would be astonished to see how red your Bible would look." He adds, "If you should cut out everything associated with blood there would be no salvation left at all." D. L. Moody, another noted revivalist, is no less bloody in some of his sermons. In one of them he used this choice language: "If you read your Bibles carefully you will see the scarlet thread running through every page of them. The blood commences to flow in Genesis, and runs on to Revelation. That is what God's book is written for. Take out the scarlet thread, and it would not be worth carrying home." In the face of this, you seem to be almost shocked because I deemed Yahweh a bloody God and his Bible a bloody book. If Yahweh, after hundreds of years had passed away, came to the conclusion that he no longer took pleasure in what he had before commanded, and used these words, "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? I am full of burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts, and I delight not in the blood of bullocks or of lambs or of he-goats," it only goes to show that he was a changeable God, and, as I remarked in my last, he is improving with age and is not so fond of blood, murder, and war as he used to be. I think you will hardly be able to disprove that proposition. It has been suggested that the reason why so many bulls, heifers, and sheep were sacrificed to Yahweh was because the priests were very fond of beef and mutton. They got the best of the meat, while Yahveh was turned off with the blood, stench, entrails, etc.

To return to the canon and the founding of the Christian system, I will close by giving you a quotation from another clergyman, the Rev. James Cranbrook, Edinburgh, taken from his "Founders of Christianity," Trübner & Co., London, page 295, trusting you are partial to the opinions of the reverend clergy. He says: "Now the whole authority and worth of the Christian religion depend upon the genuineness and authenticity of the four books called the gospels. Even the Roman Catholic church is obliged to rest ultimately upon these. So that in examination into this authority and worth our first inquiry of the Christian advocates is, How do you know that these books are genuine and authentic? They answer, 'Because we can trace them down to the present time in the writings of the Christians, where they are owned as the works of the authors to whom they are ascribed and as of divine authority.' We then ask them to show us what Christian writings of the first and second centuries they have bearing out this assertion. And, first of all, they put into our hands certain letters which they say were written by men who lived in the next generation to the writers of the gospels, who had seen some of the apostles, and whom they therefore call Apostolic Fathers. Well, we look through these letters, and do not find one word about the authors of the gospels. 'Oh, no,' say the advocates, 'they do not mention them by name; but see, here are passages they quote from the gospels.' We look at the passages; there are very few of them, and, I think, not one in the words of the gospels. They are similar, but not the same passages. 'That is because the Fathers quoted from memory,' say the advocates. What a bad memory, then, they must have had, for scarcely once do they quote a short passage right! But that assertion is a mere conjecture. How do they know that these authors were not quoting accurately from some other book? Or how do they know they were not quoting from sayings current in the ordinary gossip circulating around them? The Christian advocates are silent, for they have no answer to give.

"Nor is that all, for out of the midst of these advocates comes a certain class of critics saying: 'Never mind about these apostolic Fathers, for their writings certainly abound with spurious passages, and it is very doubtful whether any of them are authentic. Nay, it is almost certain that there never was such a man as one of them, Clement, bishop of Rome. The probability is that the letters belong to the latter part of the second century. Since, then, the letters themselves are not proved to be authentic, they can not authenticate the gospels. We, therefore, break off the first link in the chain of evidence the Christian advocates offer us, and throw it away as worthless.' What, then, is the second? Here they brighten up. 'Why,' say they, 'we have the express testimony of a man who in his youth had seen the apostle John, who was the friend of Polycarp, John's disciple; he declares that the gospels were written by the authors to whom they are ascribed; and he lived only about eighty or ninety years after Christ's death.' Will you be kind enough, we ask, to show us his book? 'Oh, that has unfortunately perished; but Eusebius, the historian, quotes the passage.' Will you tell us, then, how Eusebius knew the book he quotes was written by this man? That they cannot do; so that we are to take the gossiping Eusebius's word for it. But let that pass. How far was this man Papias trustworthy? May we in all cases take his word? 'Oh, no, not in all cases; he sometimes tells most absurd tales about John and Christ; and Eusebius himself as much as calls him an old fool.' Indeed, then how shall we tell in this case we may trust him? Echo answers, How? Besides this, when we come to examine what Papias is represented as actually saying, we find it does not bear the testimony the advocates have asserted it does, but, as Strauss has shown, it rather militates against the authenticity of the gospels as they at present exist. So that the second link in the chain of evidence is broken off as worthless.

"There is now only left the forlorn hope Justin Martyr, who wrote more than a hundred years after the death of Christ. He quotes a book he calls the Memorabilia of the Apostles. His quotations are not numerous, but some of them are much like verses found in the gospels, and some of them very unlike. But as the book is called by another name, and as nothing is more likely than that many books might contain similar things when giving an account of a particular man's sayings and doings, Justin Martyr affords no testimony to the gospels. And thus the third link is broken off their chain of evidence as worthless.

"We will not insult the understanding of the advocates by supposing that they would consider the testimony of Irenæus alone as worth anything. So that the external evidence to the authenticity of the four gospels eatirely breaks down, and the books have to stand upon their own intrinsic worth alone."

Thus I could continue to quote from this reverend author, but space will not allow. I have already occupied so much room that I will be obliged to defer till my next my examination of your criticisms on the defects of the teachings of Jesus, with other remarks I proposed to make. D. M. B.

The Integrity of Junius.

BY W. H. BURR.

Forty years after Junius concluded his work a new edition of his letters was published, including for the first time sixty-three private letters to his publisher, Woodfall, ten private letters to John Wilkes, and one hundred and one so-called miscellaneous letters of Junius under various signatures. A few of the private letters and most of the miscellaneous ones are certainly spurious. We can judge of their authenticity now just as well as the editor could in 1812. Fifty-nine or sixty of the private letters are dated conjecturally by the editor, and many of the miscellaneous letters rest their sole claim on a coincidence between the dates of publication and the dates affixed to one or other of the private letters to H. S. Woodfall (London Athenæum, 1852).

One year after the publication of these miscellaneous letters, John Taylor, one of the proprietors of the London Magazine, thought that he discovered that Philip Francis was Junius, and in 1816 he published a book attempting to prove it. Whether anybody before him had ever suspected Francis, I never heard, but Taylor certainly was the first who attempted to establish the identity, and he did it almost entirely on those unauthenticated miscellaneous letters, beginning with April, 1767, when Francis was a clerk in the War office, only twenty-six years of age.

One of the arguments in favor of Francis is that "in the mouth of January, 1772, the king remarked to a friend in confidence, 'Junius is known and will write no more.' Such," says the writer, Dr. Goodrich, "proved to be the fact. His last performance was dated Jan. 21, 1772. . . . Within a few months Sir Philip Francis was appointed to one of the highest stations of profit and trust in India." Now the fact was that Francis, then a mere clerk thirty-one years of age, was suddenly turned out of office in March following, and was not appointed to the office of profit and trust in India until a year and a half afterward. But if that young war clerk was Junius, there is not among the dregs of human nature a character so false and vile as his, and Col. Ingersoll is right in calling him "a coward, a calumniator, and a sneak." But I stand ready to vindicate the stern integrity of Junius; and in order to show how he stood in the estimation of unbiased critics before Philip Francis was suspected to be Junius, I submit a few extracts from the Preliminary Essay in Woodfall's edition, written and published in 1812:

"In reality Junius, though a severe satirist, was not in his general temper a malevolent writer nor an ungenerous man. No one has ever been more ready to admit the brilliant talents of Sir William Blackstone than himself, or to apply to his commentaries for legal information, while reprobating his conduct in the unconstitutional expulsion of Mr. Wilkes from the House of Commons."

"Yet there were statesmen whom he believed to be truly honest and upright, and for whom he felt a personal as well as a political reverence, and it is no small proof of the keenness of his penetration that the characters whom he then singled out from the common mass of pretenders to genuin patriotism hav been ever since growing in the public estimation and are now justly looked back to as the pillars and bulwarks of the English Constitution."

"Vaughan himself had so high an opinion of our author's integrity, though a total stranger to him, that he intrusted him with his private papers upon the subject in question, which Junius in return took care to employ to Vaughan's advantage."

"Whether the writer of these letters had any other and less worthy object in view than that he uniformly avowed, namely, a desire to subserve the best political interests of his country, it is impossible to ascertain with precision. It is unquestionably no common occurrence in history to behold a man thus steadily, and almost incessantly, for five years volunteering his services in the cause of the people amidst abuse and slander from every party, exposed to universal resentment, unknown, and not daring to be known, without having any personal object to acquire, any sinister motiv of individual aggrandizment or reward. Yet nothing either in his public or private letters affords us the remotest hint that he was thus actuated. Throughout the whole, from first to last, in the midst of all his warmth and rancor, his argument and declamation, his appeals to the public, and his notes to his confidential friend, he seems to hav been influenced by the stimulus of sound and genuin patriotism alone. With this he commenced his career, and with this he retired from the field of action, retaining at last, a twelvemonth afterward (see private letters, Jan. 19, 1773), the latest period in which we are able to catch a glimpse of him, the same political sentiments he had professed on his first appearance before the world, and still ready to renew his efforts the moment he could perceive that they had a chance of being attended with benefit. Under these circumstances, therefore, however difficult it may be to acquit him altogether of personal considerations, it is still more difficult, and must be altogether unjust, ungenerous, and illogical, to suspect his integrity."

The justice and candor of this writer is completely established by the discovery that Paine was Junius. "If I hav anywhere expressed myself over-warmly," says Paine, "'tis from a fixed, immovable hatred I hav and ever had to cruel men and cruel measures" (Crisis, No. 2, 1777). "I speak an open, disinterested language dictated by no passion but that of humanity. To me, who hav not only refused offices, because I thought them improper, but hav declined rewards I might with reputation hav accepted, it is no wonder that meanness and imposition appear disgusting. Independence is my happiness, and I view things as they are without regard to place or person; my country is the world, and my religion is to do good" (Rights of Man, 1792). "In a great affair, where the happiness of man is at stake, I love to work for nothing" (1802). "I take neither copyright nor profit from anything I publish" (1807). "I hav lived an honest and useful life to mankind; my time has been spent in doing good, and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator God" (Will, 1809).

Chainey's Infidel Pulpit.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If Liberalism is ever to become a power for good in this country it must be by the earnest exertions of its friends. Those who believe that Freethought is to prove the savior of humanity should constantly be on the alert to take advantage of every opportunity to educate the people out of ignorance and superstition.

Recently a new movement has been inaugurated in the city of Boston which must prove very beneficial to the Liberal cause if it is well supported by the Liberal public. George Chainey, our recent able and scholarly recruit from the Christian clergy, has established a lectureship in Paine Hall, a very appropriate place, and he proposes to deliver a lecture every Sunday afternoon in that hall to the Liberals of Boston and the public generally, and on the week following hav his lecture printed in pamphlet form for general distribution. He has already published six of these lectures, and those who hav read them I am sure must see they are what the times demand; they are certainly a valuable addition to our Liberal literature. And this is the method Mr. Chainey has adopted to giv these lectures a general circulation and at the same time provide a sufficient revenue to compensate the speaker and publisher: He solicits subscriptions for one year at the low rate of one dollar—less than two cents a lecture. And it appears to me that there should be thousands of Liberals in the United States and Canada that will at once become supporters to this new movement by sending in their names as annual subscribers. And those who are able should subscribe for a number of copies for general distribution.

My Liberal friends, if this new movement is well sustained in Boston, other similar movements will be started in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Philadelphia, San Francisco, and all other large cities. As you love light and knowledge and the advancement of Freethought, see to it that Mr. Chainey's undertaking proves a great success. H. L. GREEN.

A Word with Chief-Justice Comegys of Delaware.

You, sir, hav placed yourself in a peculiar position. Your charge to the grand jury at Wilmington, on Monday, Feb. 7, 1881, fixes you in the minds of thinking men as possessed of a craving to emulate the reputation of Judge Jefferies, and to be willing to do what little you can to remand us to the envious judicial condition of the "dark ages."

This charge says, "No community such as ours can exist as a healthy, moral organization where men are allowed to speak without challenge against the very and only foundation upon which it securely rests, the overruling power of God." This, in the nineteenth century, and in a corner of the United States!

In using this inciting and revolutionary language, you descend from what ought to be your high position as a judicial officer, and misstate the question. Men are not "allowed to speak without challenge." Any man can be challenged for his utterances, be they what they may, and in a fair and impartial manner they can be examined and debated as becomes a community in which reason and the right of conscience hold sovereign sway.

The "challenge" you hav in view is the challenge of the law, the challenge of the strong over the weak, the challenge of might over right, and you are a moral coward to suggest it from the bench; and more than this, you are guilty of judicial perjury, as your oath of office binds you to absolute impartiality in the administration of justice, and you overstep it in this infamous charge.

You talk glibly about "God," a something utterly foreign to your comprehension, in whatever form it may be viewed. You can no more comprehend it than you can the immensity of distance from this earth to the farthest fixed star.

"The insulting of God," "the overruling power of God," are terms crammed into your mind through whatever processes of thought you are capable of, and only represent to your glimmering reason the things you yourself would say or do.

When slavery was one of the beneficent institutions of Delaware, your idea of God led you to believe that it was an emanation from him, an outgrowth of his divinity. I do not know what creed you honor with your allegiance, but whichever one it is, God is to you a symbol of its peculiar formulas, by which to a given extent its fungous and parasitic growth is fastened on a portion of humanity.

The language of your charge, in which you are so anxious to persecute Ingersoll, would apply with equal force to the Unitarians, a very respectable body of our fellow-citizens, some of whom no doubt are unfortunate enough to liv in Delaware. They depose Christ from his lofty position as the equal of God, this "God" you appear to be so familiar with, and merely regard him as a great moral teacher. This, if admitted, destroys the trinity, the three in one and one in three, and is "blasphemy." It is very "insulting to God" to deprive him of one-third of his divinity, and comes under your "statute of 1740." Are you ready to stir up a raid on this body of your fellow-citizens? If so, Unitarians had better emigrate from "little Delaware," as President Lincoln called her. Her judge seems to partake of her geographical stature at any rate.

Ordinarily I should not be so specific, but as you liv in Delaware I shall take this occasion to remind you that through the forces which rule modern society, steam and electricity, "we are taking off the old and putting on the new," and all the peoples of this planet are rapidly assuming situations of comity, socially, morally, and intellectually, unknown before since man emerged from his radiate condition. Only a small portion of the human race believe in Christianity.

The western boundaries of our vast republic are laved by the waves of an ocean reaching to the shores of India, China, and Japan, the cradles of civilization, and embracing two-thirds of the population of the globe, and all these millions believe in doctrins which to you seem "blasphemous." If under such treaties with the orientals, some of their philosophers should come here, and they are doing so already, and giv their views on our "church and state" religion in Wilmington, Del., with Judge Comegys on the bench, they would be absolutely certain to spend a portion of their lives in its penitentiary.

The judge's moral courage effervesces like soda-water, and he froths and bubbles as though under a heavy pressure, for he is pleased to say, "We shall in no wise be deterred from the performance of our duty by the sneers of the devotees of any other faith than that of the body of the people of this state (?) or the deprecatory expressions of those who think the right of free speech will be infringed thereby." Oh, you are a judicial jewel!

How imperceptibly your honor gravitates toward the "dark ages!" You say, "Blasphemy was an ancient common law offense, and was also made a crime by a Delaware statute as long ago as 1740." In 1540 they hung witches in Boston, condemned to the gallows by wise judges on the bench. About 1640 Peter Menuit, probably an ancestor of yours, sailed up the Delaware river in a queer old craft, with bulging sides, like a well-fed burgher, and stem and stern high in air, a perfect picture of the world as found at that day. In imagination I see your worthy ancestor sitting on the "poop" of the old vessel gazing vacantly around him on the wonders of the new world.

Now steamships are wont to glide on the peaceful Delaware. A slight advance, you see; but the law and the gospel are the same yet—with you. About 1540 Giordano Bruno was burned at the stake for teaching the doctrin that "the world moves." In 1440, if you did not believe that the bread was the absolute body of Christ and the wine his real blood, they burned you at the stake or tore you to pieces on the rack; and judges on the bench said, "We shall in no wise be deterred from the performance of our duty by the sneers of the devotees of any other faith." In 1340 kings and princes bowed in humble adoration before the pope and kissed his pontifical toe, and the judges said, Amen. In 1240—but why go further? I shall only make one more reference to precedent, and beg to refer you to the "chap in the dug-out, with the spoonful of brains in the back of his head," with long teeth, and club in hand, ready to crush in the skull of any one who differed with him on law or theology—a first-class type of the average Delaware judge.

If this charge is a criterion by which to judge of the average justice dispensed in your court, what chance would a man hav in a suit before you who was candid enough to admit that the honest exercise of his reason forbade him to believe in a God, a trinity, or the Christian system? Suppose his case largely depended on his own testimony? And suppose the other side to be orthodox, and provided with plenty of money to take every advantage the law givs? Though the unbeliever might pile up testimony as high as Chimborazo, yet with an ordinary addle-headed Delaware jury, if governed at all by the charge they would receive, his chances for justice would not be worth a straw.

If, instead of raking up musty and disgusting evidences of antiquated ignorance and bigotry, you would turn over a new legal leaf and do all in your power to hasten the blotting from our statute books of these evidences of a decaying and dead past, how much better would you appear to the eyes of your countrymen!

All judges hav been lawyers, and none know better than they of the disgraceful and unjust laws which are a source of infamy to our country. Do they ever do anything to improve this condition of things? Never. Why? Because a cowardly timidity seizes them, and they chatter the craven plea, "I do not make the laws; my business is to enforce them." And so we hobble on from year to year, a prey to medieval lunacy and modern imbecility.

After this survey of the whole matter, I feel impelled to say that I consider your honor a moral, an intellectual, and a judicial deformity, and no more fit to sit in judgment on the lives and fortunes of your fellow-men than a Bushman from the Cape of Good Hope.

In conclusion, allow me to congratulate myself that I do not liv in Delaware. ONONON.

History Repeats Itself.

Some wiseacre has epigrammatically said that "history repeats itself." This notion has been received with assent ever since the days of Solomon, who expressed it in his jocular way as follows, "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be, and that which is done is that which shall be done." Joking apart, it is positiv that pensiv people perpetually perceive parallelisms between present predicaments and past positions.

Away down south in Delaware there has just been repeated, with little or no variation of its original conditions, a scene which was presented many years ago upon the trial of the celebrated case of Bardell vs. Pickwick (reported in Pickwick Papers, ch. 34). The gentleman who reports this leading and frequently cited case says, "The little judge looking with an angry countenance over his desk said, 'You had better be careful, sir!'" The little judge had been asleep. To-day they hav a little judge in Delaware who has also been asleep, and suddenly awakening from a stupor of ages is struck with a vague belief that the nineteenth century requires him to make some demonstration, so he looks with an angry countenance over his desk and says to Mr. Ingersoll, "You had better be careful, sir!" And how ineffably little he is! Like his prototype, all you can see of him is "two queer little eyes, one broad pink face, and somewhere about half of a big and very comical looking wig," struggling hard to peer out over the top of his circumscribed premises, and squealing like the decayed giant Pope in Bunyan's story, his pitiful, "You had better be careful, sir!" The little judge is very sleepy and very angry, and the judicial wig looks all the while more and more quaint and comical, and the comicality increases with the little judge's malignity, until the climax is reached and he screams, "You had better be careful, sir!"

Mr. Ingersoll is a splendid reproduction of Sam Weller for this new picture. Honest, earnest, sincere, and truthful, we can imagine him replying in the language of his immortal forerunner: "That's what they tell me all the time, my lord! And I am werry careful, werry careful indeed, my lord!"

And we believe that he is careful, for who can point to a stain upon Mr. Ingersoll? Imbued with a deeply religious sentiment, which it hath not entered into the mind of the little judge to comprehend, he goes on giving his testimony, and his testimony as thus far given encourages us to hope that some day we will realize something new under the sun—that some day the world will gain wisdom enough to estimate at their proper value and to put in their proper place those who return thanks that they are not like other men, and stand by and cry "chops and tomato sauce," that light will dawn upon the land of the whipping-post, that for such men as the little judge "old things will pass away and all things become new," and that persecution of men for the benefit of God will cease forever from the earth.

How Can They Do It?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Sir: I would like to ask a question by way of a conundrum. If it is true, as I hav heard it said to be, that it takes all the surplus earnings of 5,000 workingmen yearly to pay the interest on the wealth of Vanderbilt and others like him, how can they become rich, or even, as the saying is, provide against a rainy day, as it is said by many rich men that they can do? I confess for myself that I am ignorant in the matter, and I should like to know how they figure it out.

MILTON SMITH.

Is Mind Material?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In resuming the discussion of this question I hardly know where to begin, there has been so much written by different correspondents on the same subject since my first article was penned that was entirely unexpected that many of my arguments must seem to be only a repetition of what has already been presented, though not exactly in the same relation to the subject. I hav thought that perhaps it would be as well to leave the application of those arguments, so far as they are applicable in the case, to your readers, passing them over entirely, and content myself with the presentation of my final and closing argument, and end the discussion; but fearing that my meaning might be mistaken, and a misapplication made, I hav concluded to go on with a few of those arguments, trusting to your generosity to carry me through in your columns with what I shall hav to say.

If it can be made to appear that the mind is not the result of material organization, then it must follow, of course, that if it is not a spiritual, it must be some sort of an entity as incomprehensible to us as a spiritual would be, consequently I choose to adopt the term spiritual, for the fact is that the mind does exist, that it is an individuality, whether the result of material organization or of some other cause. It does not necessarily prove that the mind or life principle is the result of material organization because we never see it manifested only in those peculiar organizations; and it would be just as impossible to show how those organizations could produce those results as to show how mind could exist independent of those conditions.

To make the assertion that nothing exists that is not material or the result of material organization does not prove that it is true. If it is impossible for us to know all the possibilities and capabilities of matter that we can see and know something of, would it not be the greatest presumption on our part to assert that nothing could exist that was not material or the result of matter? I cannot understand my own existence, and how am I to know all the possibilities of a spiritual existence—of which I can know nothing—through the medium of those material organs of sense which were designed only to be a means of communication with the material universe?

That mind exists I know, but how that mind exists I do not know. I know that matter exists, but how that matter exists I do not know.

The one is as much a mystery as the other. There they stand. The only way that I can see to solve the difficulty is to adopt the rule by which we learn everything that we can know of all that exists in the universe, viz., the law of cause and effect. It is upon that principle that every discovery in the laws of nature hav been made by tracing the order of things or the connection between cause and effect; the relation in which the one stands to the other.

The engineer, understanding this principle, that certain causes produce certain effects, can go to work and make all his calculations for the construction of a steam-engin, or any other kind of machinery, and know as exactly what the engins or other machinery will do before he commences the construction of them as he can know after they are completed, unless he has made some mistake in his calculations in regard to the effects of certain causes, for which reason his machinery may in some way be disproportioned or something unadapted; and as soon as he sets the machinery at work he will see at once where the mistake was, and go to work and correct the error. It is in this way that every discovery and every invention has been made—the magnetic telegraph, the steam-engin, the telephone, the electric light; in fact, there is nothing of which we know anything that has not been learned in that way.

There must be a cause for everything that exists. That is what nature teaches us. Then if mind is not the result of material organization, what is the cause of it? In reflecting upon this subject, I hav come to the conclusion that the mind is created by the same power that has created the body that it inhabits, and that the one was intended to be adapted to the other as truly as a steam-engin may be intended to be adapted to the work it was made to perform. That is the only reasonable solution that I can see of the problem.

We are told that we cannot go outside of the universe for the cause, for the very good reason that there is no outside of the universe, and that the universe is material, and that what is not in the universe is nothing, and that consequently the mind must be the result of matter, or in some way so mixed up with it that we cannot know which is the result of the other, or whether they are one and the same.

That proposition seems to me entirely untenable. I cannot see the necessity of going outside of the universe for a cause if it were possible, or of depending upon matter for a cause. I cannot see why there should not be an intelligent cause for everything that exists; nor can I see how anything can exist without an intelligent cause. I cannot see how an intelligence could ever be without an intelligent cause any more than I can understand how anything else can exist without an intelligent cause, nor do I conceive it necessary to go outside of the universe to find it. I think it can be found, or a parallel that will serve to illustrate my idea in my own existence. The mind being immaterial, a spirit occupies no space. My body takes up no more room with the mind than it would without it. A thought, a volition of the mind, cannot be conceived of as occupying space; it is immaterial, like the mind. This mind does all the thinking, all the planning, and lays out all the work for the body; it is the power that controls every intelligent act of my life; it is my life, an invisible, intelligent, spiritual power that is the cause of all that I can ever do in this life; and when the mind and body are separated the work of the body ceases. I suppose that myriads of minds might be engaged in considering the same object from the same point in space without interfering with one another, they being immaterial intelligences without material limits or conditions, though finite, and not omniscient or omnipresent, like the infinit deity.

I consider that the cause of all things occupies the same relation to the universe that my mind does to my body; that the eternal, self-existent, supreme intelligence, mind, is manifested in and through the universe in the same manner as my mind is manifested through this material organization, and that that intelligence is the soul of the universe—the all in all; the great I Am. That is my God.

And now, having committed myself thus far, yourself and your readers may be inclined to ask if I believe in the God of the Bible, the Jew God. I would answer, Yes and No. In so far as his eternal existence is concerned, I would say, Yes; but in regard to the character attributed to him I would say, most emphatically, No. The idea of a God possessing the attributes of foreknowledge (which I believe God does and must necessarily possess) going to work deliberately and creating millions of beings of our capacities or any other capacity for the enjoyment of happiness or the suffering of misery, when he knew, and of course intended, that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand, or one, even, of the whole mass would and should suffer eternal torment, is too horrible to think of. I think that the belief in such a God as that, and the being made the partakers of the divine nature, as the orthodox Christians claim, we must be in conversion. To be the partakers of the nature of such a God as that would be just the thing to fit a man or woman to commit any crime within the possibilities of our nature, and to go on from crime to crime with a heart harder than the nether mill-stone without the least compunction of conscience or sympathy for the victims of his or her injustice and cruelty until outraged humanity would arise en masse and by some means or other put an end to the infernal career.

Falseness of the Churches.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Walt Whitman, in a letter to R. W. Emerson, says: "The churches are one vast lie; the people do not believe them, and they do not believe themselvs; the priests are continually telling what they know well enough is not so, and keeping back what they know is so. The spectacle is a pitiful one. I think there can never be again upon the festiv earth more bad-disordered persons deliberately taking seats as of late in these states at the heads of the public tables; such corpses' eyes for judges; such a rascal and thief in the presidency."

In the Chicago Standard of February 3d, Prof. W. C. Wilkinson, D.D.—whoever he may be—after patronizingly manipulating George Eliot, making ignoble reference to her "crime against morality," concludes in this wise: "What comfort it would be to know that at the last and sharpest hight of her experience in passing from life to death she said, 'I yield, I yield, I see, I know, I believe; Lord Jesus receive my spirit!' We only know that Jesus can hear when we cannot, and that the eleventh hour lasts till night. Whatever he does will be right."

Poor Wilkinson, D.D.! Hadn't you better ask Jesus, who can hear, all about the matter, and so "comfort" yourself on the spot? You are sick, stupid, weak. We pity you as much as you pity George Eliot. Then you really think the revered writer's lack of conventionalism calls for absolution from the priest, do you? Ah, you don't believe in the priest, neither does the priest believe in you. Farther than to believe you are damned, does he ever think of you? and from church premises he is logical. Are you a Protestant, Prof. W. C. Wilkinson, D.D.? So was George Eliot.

D.D.'s should hav respect for degrees. We shall protest on and on till the ripe days of millennium, when your stupidity will evidence the asinine quality. God pity you and spare such as are brought within the sphere of your poverty-stricken understanding!

Letters from Friends.

QUARTZBURG, IDAHO TER., April 10, 1881.

BROTHER D. M. BENNETT: I hav been out lecturing in behalf of your contemplated tour around our little planet; and as noses count at the ballot box, so do five dollars count when in sufficient numbers. Out of our little village of about eighty inhabitants I inclose to your address the sum of fifty dollars, each name being the donor of five dollars.

Charles Wilson,	Quartzburg,	$5 00
William Sweet,	"	5 00
Charles E. Clark,	"	5 00
James Lafferty,	"	5 00
R. G. Allen,	"	5 00
Michael Burk,	"	5 00
William France,	"	5 00
A. G. Phillips,	"	5 00
Andrew Fosau,	"	5 00

All the above names say, Go by all means.

Wishing you a pleasant journey, attended with all possible success, I remain, Truly yours,

A. G. PHILLIPS.

CASTLE HILL, ME., Jan. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose $3. Please send me two copies of "An Infidel Abroad." When you start on the trip round the world you can call on me to assist you in your journey. I know that I shall be well paid for my investment in the impartial record of your travels in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully yours, HENRY FILLEY.

DAYTON, WASH. TER., March 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You can call on me for $5 for your trip round the world. Yours truly,

J. H. WILLIAMS.

ESCANABA, MICH., April 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hope you will not circumnavigate, but if you do I will send you $5 before you go.

CHAS. D. JOHNSON.

MOLINE, ILL., April 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Count me as one that will giv $5 toward raising the necessary funds to send you round the world. John Owens and Wm. Beeres will also giv $5 each. Yours truly, H. S. WOOD.

UNION CITY, MICH., April 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: David Gifford, of Union City, authorizes me to tell you that he will contribute $5 toward the funds for the journey round the planet. Please place his name on the list and draw on him when the money is to be collected. Respectfully,

C. S. ROWLEY

MEEKER, COL., April 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: If it is acceptable, I would like to advance $5 and take a copy of your book, "The Trip Around the World." Yours fraternally,

JAMES CARTER.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, April 12, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: If you are fated to take the trip round the world, I will giv my five dollars, but I'd rather keep you at home. You are much more worthy to send off on such a tour than the D.D.'s, who belong to the devil they are ever fighting so furiously. Yours for truth, MRS. LYNDOLL.

HUDSON, MICH., April 18, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I find by your friendly letters that many of your friends think you ought not to make the trip around the world, but ought to stay at home and take care of your paper. I did not discover that the paper suffered materially by your absence to Albany or Europe. At any rate it was good enough and ably conducted. And another thing to be considered is, when will another such opportunity present itself to get a history of the world written in the plain, familiar style of D. M. Bennett, which dispenses with the necessity of having Webster's Unabridged lying at your side to search for the meaning of words that are out of the reach of the common people? Also we do not wish to be burdened with long accounts of great ovations and ostentatious shows to some great dignitaries for which in this country we hav no very great respect. We want to hear more of the ordinary affairs of life, of the manners, customs, and modes of living of the common people than what we had in other histories. And where is the person who can write it up equal to yourself? I think he does not exist in the present century, and will not perhaps in the next. I say, Go! You are younger, I believe, than W. H. Seward was when he went, and probably full as able to stand the journey. Of leaving your domestic affairs you are certainly a better judge than any of us can be. When you want the $5 giv me notice, and it shall be forthcoming.

Yours respectfully, GEO. WILLIAMS.

MEXICO, MO., Feb. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: This is the year that some old woman prophesied that the world would stop going around, but in my judgment the prophecy has been misunderstood. It means that some great man is going around the world. At any rate, let us as true-minded Liberals hav it that way, as it sounds far more reasonable. And by the way let us all assist in having it so by contributing a "V." As for myself I hav a "V" which Bro. Bennett shall hav when he is ready to start. Besides the "V," I will hav three I's ready when the book is ready to go toward paying for material and labor. And oh, no one knows how I will value that book but myself! It shall be my Bible of Truths, and when you are ready to start, Bro. Bennett, my blessings are with you. May your sorrows be few and your pleasures many, and woe be unto the man that curses the ship that brings our hero back. Then we will hav the banner of truths unfurled, and cause a murmuring among the stale ranks of Christian bigots, priestcraft, and hypocrits, such as, "What manner of things is this that we hear?" etc.

Yours until we are masticated, D. C. KNODERER.

SNOWVILLE, VA., April 10, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I see that many are asking promisers to send on their five's at once, so we send ours, knowing that go or stay we shall receive from thee double its worth. And should thee wear one of those Wilsonias during thy trip thee will be sure to come home safely, so no more fears need be entertained on that score by the timid who hesitate to risk their deity out into the "wide, wide world."

And as to the paper, I pledge myself to send $5.00 a year to its treasury as long as thee is absent, unless thee departs into the great unknown. And I am sure every one of those who say "Go," will agree to do likewise, for I am certain if I can do this they also will be able to. Thine earnestly and hopefully, E. D. SLENKER.

NORTH YAMHILL, OR., March 20, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I shall take the liberty henceforth to call you dear old friend. Your card and books came duly to hand. I am very much pleased with the book, "An Infidel Abroad." It is well worth $1.50. Dear Bennett, I can't say that I will hav the "V" for you when you are ready to start on the trip round the world. I am poor; but my heart is with you; and if I keep my health I shall hav one of the books when they are out.

Yours truly, G. W. SMITH.

NEBRASKA CITY, NEB., April 10, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Diverse are the opinions of your friends as to the advisability of your intended circumnavigation of our planet, though by far the larger number express themselvs in favor of the project. I am among those who are anxious to hav you make the journey, and consider it a privilege to contribute my mite toward making up the necessary funds. I think every person of Liberal tendencies should proudly and joyously embrace this opportunity and make himself or herself famous by doing likewise, and thereby enable you to take the trip and become indirectly instrumental in the production of such a book as never was written before, nor is likely to be again soon.

We hav the assurance that we shall be amply repaid for the outlay, as all that hav perused your letters from Europe are convinced of. The objections made to the trip are, in my judgment, not very weighty as long as you are able and willing to make the observatory journey. It has been proved to our satisfaction that THE TRUTH SEEKER craft during your thirteen months of unjust imprisonment, and later, when sojourning in Europe, has been firmly and dauntlessly steered on the turbulent waters of Freethought journalism.

Regarding the unpleasantness and dangers incidental to travel in this as well as other countries, I think they are no greater than those that are lurking at home in the proximity of that sneaking decoyer, heartless persecutor, and base sensualist that prowls about seeking whom he may destroy. I hate to pronounce the name of the wretch who will not minister to the wants of an aged parent, who decoys men and women into wrong doing, and hire unfortunate females to prance before him in a nude state while his sensuality feasts on their person. Any man or set of men that will countenance such a monster are true prototypes of him that is so profligate. I heard a lady lecturer at one of our churches refer to this fellow as "that good man," but I would like to hav told her that at least a few present knew him to be a consummate scoundrel.

Now, brother Bennett, you will please pardon me for waxing a little warm and for not being quite as brief as I might be. As you solicited the opinions of all your friends on this round-the-world trip, I would like to hav my little say about it, and as I hav already stated that I am anxious for you to go, I would say to you do not fail to visit Mount Ararat where Noah landed with his ark, and several other noted places, among which is Peniel, so named by Jacob on the morning that succeeded the night during which that great wrestle came off between himself and Jehovah, and in which the latter could not prevail against Jacob until he put his thigh out of joint.

While you are in the country please hunt up Mrs. Lot and inform us what the current belief of the inhabitants regarding her hard and useless fate is. Our Christian ladies will bear me out in this, namely, that it was the greatest piece of barbarism just for looking around and taking a farewell look at the doomed cities to be transformed into a pillar of salt. What would become of the human race for such trivial offenses if all the women should meet so sad and cruel an end? and all for no purpose, because they hav never ceased from that day to this in looking around at forbidden things. When we come to look at the affair from a common sense view, we inevitably arrive at the conclusion that it would hav been much better if Lot had been served in the way that his wife was, or left with the doomed in the city. A great amount of evil, bloodshed, and carnage would hav been avoided which afterward became necessary, attributable to Lot's incestuous relations with his daughters, which resulted in the conception and birth of Moab and Amnon, who, in their turn, became fathers of large tribes. The whole story shows poor judgment on the part of Jove as to the selection and preservation of the future progenitors of the human family. The story is too divinely ridiculous, and its only redeeming feature is the improbability of its being true.

I would like to ventilate the other stories already referred to, but I fear I am imposing on good nature, therefore I will come to a close, wishing you a safe journey and that the powers that be in harmony with your good sense, discretion, and far-sightedness keep and preserve you (not in salt, however), and restore you in due time to your friends fraught with knowledge suited to disinthrall the fettered minds of mankind for centuries to come. Do not forget to put me down for $5, and if need be a couple more.

One thing more I would say to you, respected sir, namely, that I admire no man more than you, and that I like your paper, to which I hav been a subscriber since its incipiency in Paris, Ill.

If you hav not laid out your plan of travel, could I not hope to meet you, either when going or returning from the West, at Omaha, on the U. P. R. R.? The latter place is only fifty miles from here, and that distance I will go to see and shake hands with you. Yours, HENRY SCHMITZ.

[If we make that circuit of the globe we will return home from Japan to San Francisco, returning thence to this city, and will take pleasure in calling upon such friends as we can see conveniently. There are thousands in the far West whom we would be very glad to take by the hand.—ED. T. S.]

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., April 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am too poor to help keep the "wolf away" and sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER as its merits demand. Judging by the friendly letters, there are many in like circumstances. I hav nothing to promis for round-the-world trip, but I will pay for the paper as long as I can get the money. If you stay at home, and get in a pinch for a little money, I will use exertion enough to pay for one more extra copy.

It is very evident that there are many who do not realize the amount of money you need to make the paper just what they would like to hav it. Please to continue my son's paper (W. L. P. Elmer) one year.

Find inclosed $6. If it is not sufficient to pay for one year's subscription and the five volumes of Truth Seeker Tracts let me know and I will remit the balance.

If you could make it convenient to travel in our own country and giv us a knowledge of all that pertains to it, I should consider it of much more value than a history of all the world beside. I express my true convictions. Pardon my ignorance.

Your friend, W. G. ELMER.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Feb. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $10 in paper money—the amount of subscription and renewals as per inclosed list.

I hav just written a sort of advertisment for a partner in love and labor in the shape of a letter to E. H. Heywood, which I hope to see printed in the Word, if he does not consider it a little too erratic, or, in other words, a little too crazy. But as far as craziness goes, THE TRUTH SEEKER is not without its share, if I may judge by some of the expressions of the ultra Materialists. They are just as certain and bigoted in their certainty that they hav got the whole truth as the Presbyterians are. The one will ignore facts and human testimony and phenomena of to-day, just as bigotedly as the other. The one will say in explanation of phenomena it is the doings of the devil, the other calls it trickery and hallucination. Substantially they mean: "You are a bigger fool than I, or than Thompson's colt, which swam a river to get a drink. Your eyes are not as keen as mine; your ears are deaf to what mine are not," and so on to the end of the chapter. These minds occupy the one extreme of a balance, the bigots of the Christian school the other, each equally at a distance from a solid foundation. I do not speak thus only as to the matter of fact, for the principle involved holds good in almost everything that has to do with human beings. Extremes are hinted at. I cannot see wherein is the sense or advantage to truth, to act other than as an unbiased juryman as to alleged facts and testimony upon any subject, not excluding the continued life problem. Why should we be everlastingly hunting up every excuse and evasion merely to gratify a preconceived idea in the very face of what is declared to be as palpable as the noonday sun?

Is not this a new development of idiocy? Of what advantage is it to shut one's eyes and declare "there is no light, all is darkness?" And yet this is just what so many are doing. It is a fight with them to repel any invasion of their pet bigotry. No matter what the testimony, who the testifiers, it accounts for nothing but weakness. Everything must be as nothing that they may remain undisturbed in their strong hold of bigoted Liberalism. Can there be the least wisdom in such an attitude? Why not say, How unaccountable, how at variance with all my experience! As an honest truth seeker, I will not giv the lie or in any way assume my superiority of intellectual acumen and comprehensivness, and I will never deny what is asserted on evidence that would hang a man, but I will even wait for years on the impartial "anxious seat" for the unfoldment of a new discovery.

A case in point is that of my own, viz.: In June, 1877, I occupied the front parlor on the upper floor of 327 O'Farrell street, this city. Seating myself at the breakfast table, my landlady, who, by the way, is and was a public medium, addressed me thus, "What is that upon your wrist?" alluding to something on the back of my right hand wrist, to which I replied, "I guess my cuff has marked it," having been to a social dance the night before. To this she replied, "I guess your cuff hasn't done it. I see a hand pointing to it." At this I then took the first square look, and lo and behold the letters A N N I E of this kind and in the order written were plainly to be seen. These letters remained not less than forty-eight hours, and I hav two living witnesses in this city as to their reality. I know this to be the name of an only living sister, a resident of Barnsley, Yorkshire, England, and I hav the evidence of my uncle, with whom I hold correspondence, that this same sister was taken sick, as near as I could judge from his reply, at or about the time of the occurrence of this phenomenon, and died probably within six or eight months afterward. I cannot speak exactly, as my first letter to England received no reply, and my second was replied to, as it seemed to me, evasivly. Previous to this personal experience, classing and identifying myself with Spiritualists for twenty-five years, I did not believe, that is, I did not know that this blood lettering was a truth, and I do not ask anyone to believe or claim to know it to be a fact on the testimony I herewith present, but do expect fair-minded Liberals to place it in the storehouse of possibilities, reflecting, and never forgetting to reflect that "what we don't know would make a very big book."

In the twenty-five years of the forty I hav lived, I hav seen in abundance things equally remarkable, but nothing which confronted me was so positivly unaccountable except on the theory of continued life.

DR. GEORGE HARDCASTLE.

MAUSTON, WIS., April 18, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for $24.50, to be applied as stated. W. F. Jamieson closed his twentieth lecture here yesterday afternoon, winding up with his famous lecture on "Gossips," to the delight of all present. We had a good house, too, considering the bad roads. He kept us in roars of laughter. We Maustonians can recommend Mr. Jamieson to all who wish to engage him. You hav only to hear him once, and you can't fail to like him, for he's a regular music-box to all who hav a relish for truth. But he is a terror to the blind leaders of the blind; I mean, in logical argument; we hav no dipper-necked gentlemen here that dare to approach him. As short articles is your motto, I will close. Respectfully, WM. HOLGATE.

BOONTON, N. J., April 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I believe you propose making a circuit of the globe. Now do you think it prudent to enter into an undertaking like that—a voyage so hazardous that you may never return? Then what should we do without a pioneer to guide us on to victory? Well, I know you hav braved the tempest, and may outride the storm; so if you think it will promote our cause and benefit your own health, go, Bro. Bennett, and draw on me for five dollars.

Fraternally yours, PHILIP WOOTTEN.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., April 19, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I would not raise my voice in regard to your trip around the globe, as I know that I am in the minority; but as you wish to hav the views of your admirers, and I am one of them, I will say that I am decidedly opposed to it. Firstly, there is danger for your journal. Though I fully appreciate the great merits of Mr. Macdonald, I think there is for THE TRUTH SEEKER only one Bennett. Secondly, I see the coming irrepressible conflict between truth and superstition, and certainly we want then all powers standing closely together, and you as general at the helm. I see how jubilant our enemies will be when you are far off in the East, and we know not even where to reach you and hear your advice. No, sir. As much as I wish you such a recreation as the intended one—for you deserved it ten times for your stand in the good cause—I wish you to stay home.

I see the five dollars are coming to the surface now very liberally; but I think if this money were applied for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER it would do very much good; and if that should be the case, which I hardly expect, then please put me down for five dollars too. Fraternally yours,

HENRY GILDEMEISTER.

OXFORD, April 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav read so much about your trip round the world that I dreamt I took the trip with you, and as we were jogging along around this little globe we came to a place called hell. Here we stopped to take a look through, and as we were passing through I saw a man rolling a huge rough stone up the side of a mountain. He was doomed to roll it to the mountain top. He was about half way up but an unlucky slip of his foot brought him to the foot of the mountain again, and as he was toiling away at the rough stone I heard him sigh out these lines:

"Up this steep place I'm doomed to roll
This huge, rough, sabulous stone;
Will mercy never find me here?
I toil and toil alone."

Then Pluto, in a thundering voice
That shook the mountain top,
Replied, "O man, you did rebel,
Now toil and never stop."

I asked friend Bennett if that stone roller was not old Hayes. He said it was, and that he had to roll that stone to the top of the mountain for not pardoning him out of prison. As we passed on I saw a man fastened to a wheel that was perpetually turning round. The little devils would throw down stumbling-blocks and laugh to see him jerked with rapidity over them. This man was Anthony Comstock, that infernal scoundrel. From this we passed to the river Phlegethon, the water of which is sufficiently hot to boil potatoes. In this river was old Judge Benedict and the twelve jurymen flopping and floundering about crying,

"Deep damnation dark as hell,
Infernal devils here do dwell;
Old Pluto roasting damned souls
In flames of fire on burning coals."

And just as the last word died away I awoke and found that I had been dreaming, for my friend Bennett was not with me, and I was still in Ohio.

Now, if you go round the world, count me in.

Yours forever, THOS. H. DODGE.

HARMONY, N. Y., April 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar, which apply on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I would like to ask you a question, which please answer through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Is the Bible copyrighted in England?

Does the American Bible Society pay a royalty to the English Society for the privilege of publishing them in America?

I hav seen it stated somewhere that was the case, but the faithful here deny it. Please answer and oblige a subscriber. ELI LOOMIS.

GREENVILLE, ILL., April 18, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav been much interested in the controversy that is being carried on in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As to the advisability of your trip around the world, after careful consideration, I most cordially join the stay-at-homes. I believe you can do more good for the Liberal cause during the coming year by remaining in the United States than you can by going around the world. I am aware that you are a much larger man than I am, both physically and mentally; but when you attempt to spread yourself out all around this planet, you will find that you are becoming a little thin. I hav been trying the experiment on one state for over eight months; and although I hav tried to visit all of the Liberals I could find on my route, I hav only been able to make one streak—a little over a thousand miles. I hav traveled in a zigzag route from the north line of the state to as far south as Murphysboro, and as far on my return trip north as this place. I hav had some hard pulls over muddy roads and met with some trying experiences, yet I hav met with many warm friends to our cause, organized some Liberal Leagues, and sown a blue streak of Liberal literature on my route. No, Bro. Bennett, don't try to make a trip round the world this summer, but stay in the United States and travel all you can here. Attend Liberal meetings and write up the movement here at home. Here is where the great battle for mental liberty is being fought, and every soldier is needed at his post. And how can we spare a commanding general whose fighting qualities hav been tried as yours hav been? I hope every one who has sent, or who has promised to send, you money for the trip round the world will reconsider their action and drop you a postal card telling you to remain in the United States and visit as many of the states as you can, and write a work entitled, "An Infidel at Home."

I am preparing to hold a convention in Farmer City, Dewitt county, Illinois, on the 11th and 12th of June to perfect the organization of the State Liberal League of Illinois, the charter for which I received on my arrival here. I hav now the names of twenty-two charter members, and I hope to get at least three times as many more before the time of meeting. I should, above all things, be pleased to meet you there, and I believe this to be the feeling among the Liberals of Illinois. I hope to be able to close my summer trip with a rousing camp-meeting on my return to the northern part of the state this fall. I hope you will be able to meet with your Western friends there also. I believe you can do a great deal more good to the Liberal cause in this way than by making a trip round the world. What care hav the Liberals of the United States for the old, dilapidated ruins of Judea, or the wild Arabs of Egypt and Palestine? We hav larger rivers and grander scenery in the United States than in Europe, Asia, and Africa combined. And what is of more account than anything else, the friends and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER want to see the man who has stood up so bravely and battled so faithfully for the cause of universal mental liberty.

In closing, let me say to those willing to help the cause, or become members of the Illinois State League, my post-office address will be Springfield, Illinois, from this time until after the holding of the convention for the organization of the state League. I am very much in need of a little help in carrying on this work. I hope that every one who can will join with me in making the Liberal League movement a success in the state of Illinois.

Yours for universal mental liberty,

F. F. FOLLET.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., March 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber of your paper nearly four years and like it very much and can't do without it and I want it as long as I liv. I read it, and then let a friend read it, then send it out West to California in hopes to bring subscribers.

You will hear from me again.

Yours with respect, PETER B. SPANG.

FRANKFORD, PA., April 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Having a little time to write, I think I ought to renew my subscription to your most welcome paper, for I find the more I read THE TRUTH SEEKER the more I crave the food, for it is great food for the mind; it is like old wine—it improves with age. I like it very much in its new dress, and hope it will still improve. I would like to be able to say, Put me down for $5 for your trip round the world, but I don't feel prepared to do it just now. If you should go, I am in hopes that I may be able to secure a copy of your travels when they come from the press. I wish you and your partner in life a long and happy journey together while you liv.

CHARLES BORIE.

SALEM, KAN., March 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We hav, as you know, been in arrears for some time, but knowing your good honest Infidel disposition, thought you would not be angry with us.

You must know that we liv in grasshopper-ridden, drouth-stricken Kansas. Times are really hard with us, yet we do not think it hardly possible to quit our noble friend THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav read of Ingersoll in Delaware, and really I am sorry to feel so little sympathy for a brother Liberal. My mind is at once called back to the evening I read the proceedings of the Chicago Convention. Said I, "Don't Ingersoll know that there are thousands who would be just as anxious to punish him for his profanity as he would be to punish some one for so-called obscenity?" I say that obscenity cannot be properly defined; profanity can.

To a firm believer in God, heaven, and hell, a more tender cord cannot be touched than would be by taking the name of their idol in vain.

I think that about three months' imprisonment and a good heavy fine would teach brother Robert that we must strike at the very root of the evil before any lasting good can be accomplished.

Noble Wakeman! how bravely he defended the good cause all through the darkest hours! In the language of the Christian I would say, "God bless" such men as Wakeman, Leland, Rawson, Wright, Bennett, and a host of others just as deserving. I only wish we were financially situated so we might do more to aid the Liberal cause which we so much love.

We hav just received a copy of the Physiologist, and for its class of reading it certainly cannot be excelled.

Now, with best wishes for all the dear readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the kind and able editor of the same, and also his better half, I remain

Yours, the friend of liberty and truth,

MARY E. B. WILSON.

DALLAS, TEX., April 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Col. Stone, president of the Dallas Liberal League, an outspoken Materialist, was elected mayor of this city yesterday on the Republican ticket over J. J. Good, the Democratic mayor and candidate for re-election. Liberals are rejoicing over this great victory. Honest men of all parties helped us to defeat the moss-backed hypocrits. Dallas is fifty years ahead of the South generally. Liberty and light are spreading. ALLEN JOHNSON.

MRS. AMELIA H. COLBY and Mrs. Olive K. Smith will remain in Buffalo, delivering lectures on Sundays, through the month of May, ank not June as stated in our last. In June they expect to visit this city and Boston.

Beautiful Hands.

BY MRS. H. L. BUCKNER.

Beautiful hands! not soft and white,
Not gloved and hid from the blessed light;
On the fingers small no diamonds shine,
No rubies gleam, from the distant mine;
No reachings forth to the gaping crowd
As the welkin rings with greetings loud;
No gestures wild, no claspings tight,
In the din and strife for woman's right;
No scepter grasped 'mid golden sheen,
With the royal grasp of a royal queen,
But stained and marked by labor hard,
Yet subjects fit for the highest bard.
Beautiful hands!

Beautiful hands! for duty strong
In the sternest tasks, however long;
The willing hands of the gentle bride
Take up life's work with an honest pride.
Create new charms or garner wealth
For the happy home of peace and health.
Whene'er the husband tarries long
In the marts of trade or amid the throng,
The beautiful hands for him prepare
The things that make for his tender care;
And when he returns the wife to greet
The earnest hands giv welcome sweet.
Beautiful hands!

Beautiful hands! in kindly deeds
For the poor man's child or the widow's need's
They are ever ready, and true, and just
To divide the loaf in quiet trust;
And without a thought of reward or fame
They freely giv in humanity's name;
They bear for the thirsty lips to sup
The crystal draught in the humble cup;
Yes, more than this, with a broader care
Over those who are caught in passion's snare
They would throw that beautiful mantle round
Which tinkles not with an empty sound.
Beautiful hands!

Beautiful hands! the girls and boys
Are ever eager for childhood's toys,
And the diligent hands are seldom still,
But toil with a mother's cheerful will
To form the kite or dress the doll,
To gladden the heart of each and all.
The years go by and the sons are grown,
One goes away to the distant town;
In the sultry days he sickens and dies;
No mother was there to close his eyes.
They bear the corpse to the old home place,
Her hands are touching the dear dead face.
Beautiful hands!

Beautiful hands! I feel them now
As in other years they pressed my brow,
When the fever burnt and the hot blood sped
As I tried to raise my aching head;
I feel the sweetly soothing palm
As it sought the fiery rage to calm;
And when again I was strong and well
Those gentle hands on my head would dwell,
As a voice would speak of a countless gain
Oft coming thro' sorrow and strife and pain,
Of a straighter path up life's mountain side,
To sunlit slopes where our view grows wide.
Beautiful hands!

Beautiful hands! forever at rest,
Now crossed on the cold and pulseless breast;
Their humblest deed has been "well done!"
What grander praise hav the grandest won?
Grief sits enthroned by the desolate hearth,
And shadows lengthen o'er life's rough path.
The generous hands are forever closed,
From deeds of love they hav now reposed.
The beautiful hands hav ceased to guide,
The "bairns" are scattered far and wide.
But often from dreams in stranger lands
I wake to the touch of my mother's hands.
Beautiful hands!

The Devil's Shirt.

BY J. K. P. BAKER.

In fair Italia's sunny clime
it happened once upon a time,
A peasant, digging in the soil,
Found something to reward his toil.
It seemed to be a linen shirt,
Entire, but somewhat stained with dirt.
The peasant bore it to his house
And gave it to his frugal spouse,
Who, when she found her labor vain
To cleanse it from its earthy stain,
Used it awhile to mop her floor,
Then cast it on the dust-heap near the door.
Around this heap from day to day
The village urchins came to play;
And here the shirt was found by one,
The pious village baker's son.
He took it to his father's shop
And used it as an oven mop
Till, overcharged with coal and dirt,
He thought to burn this ancient shirt.
But when he threw his oven wide,
His mop unharmed but cleansed he spied.
The fagots were to ashes turned,
But of that shirt was nothing burned.
A horror freezes every vein,
A terror blazes in his brain;
He dares not move nor yet remain.
Fear fetters him as with a chain;
He fears to look, yet dares not wink
Or close his staring eyes to think.
At last, as from a nightmare woke,
Screaming into the street he broke.
"Hav mercy on me, San Guiseppe!"
He prayed at every frantic step,
Nor paused till in the priestly ear
He poured the burden of his fear.
"Come, exorcise this demon dire,
Whose very shirt withstands my fire."
Incredulous, the father hears
The story of the baker's fears;
But when he to the oven came,
And tried to burn the shirt with flame,
He told the villagers around
The baker's words were truthful found,
And something must be quickly done
To exorcise the Evil One.
So all the priests from neighboring towns,
Assembled in their sacred gowns.
They chanted many holy songs,
Drawing the shirt out with the tongs,
Then cast it on a pile of dung,
As their anathemas were sung.
Then next the oven they baptized;
Thus was the devil exorcised.
A druggist lived in the next town
Who could not take this nonsense down.
He went, he saw, he took the shirt,
He cleansed it from its recent dirt.
He gave it to a learned friend,
Who found its wondrous thread horn-blende.
And now in Naples may be seen
This Devil's Shirt of asbestine.

The Dead Moon.

The moon is in a state of decrepitude—a dead world.—Proctor.

The moon is dead, defunct, played out;
So says a very learned doctor;
She looketh well, beyond a doubt;
Perhaps she's in a trance, dear Proctor.

At any rate, she's most entrancing
For one of such decrepit age;
And on her radiant beauties glancing
She charms the eye of youth and sage.

And so the man upon her's perished!
He lived in doleful isolation;
Poor wretch! No wife his bosom cherished,
No children squalled his consolation.

Yet she's adored by all the gypsies,
Whose lovers sigh beneath her beams;
She aids the steps of staggering tipsies,
And silvers o'er romantic streams.

And once she caught Endymion sleeping,
And stooped to kiss him in a grove,
Upon him very slyly creeping;
He was her first and only love.

But that's a very ancient story,
And was a youthful indiscretion,
When she was in her primal glory,
Ere scandal schools had held a session.

Dear, darling moon! I dote upon her;
I watch her nightly in the sky;
But oh! upon my word of honor,
I'd rather she were dead than I!

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importauce than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word 'fail' in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inqulry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people ook up with reverence, evinced his seifishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

NO. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Associatiou for Improving the Conditiou of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any disconfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the 'WILSONIA" GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from auy disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

A WISE man proportions his belief to the evidence.—Hume.

JUDGE not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment (John vii, 7, 24). Prove all things, hold fast to that which is good (1 Thes. v, 21). Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge him that eateth (Romans xiv, 3-23).

THE problem of our age is to reconcile faith with knowledge, philosophy with religion. The men of our age will not believe until you prove to them that what they are called upon to believe does not contradict the law of their minds and that it rests upon a solid and unshaken foundation.—Archdeacon Hare.

THAT which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again (John iii, 6, 7). There is no doubt the laws of healthy birth are being constantly violated, causing much of human defect and misery. A right birth at first makes a "new birth" unnecessary.—Index.

THE fear o' hell's a hangman's whip,
To hold the wretch in order;
But where ye feel your honor grip
Let that aye be your border;
Its slightest touches, instant pause—
Debar a' side pretenses,
And resolutely keep its laws,
Uncaring consequences. —Burns.

DEATH is a right termination of old age. When the body is worn out and the senses are oblivious to the surrounding world, when the mind is tottering and too weak to hold its thought, then man dies unanxiously. This is nature's death. Man is made to die at the end of life; to perish like the tree when its roots no longer sustain it; to fall like the fruit when the bough can no longer nourish it. An eternity of one's self would be the worst death.—L. K. Washburn.

WHATEVER the arithmetical arrangement of the gods may be—single or triune, dual or plural—they are, in all countries and at all times, made by man in his own image. In the plural period some of the gods are good and some are bad; just as there are good and evil kings. The wicked gods obtain the largest offerings and the largest prayers just as in despotic countries the wicked kings obtain the most liberal presents, which are merely taxes in disguise.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THERE is no religious authority or oracle to be found anywhere that in the reception, transmission, and diffusion of its word has been or could be entirely independent of human agencies, conditions, and elements, and consequently none can be free altogether from human fallibility. If religion forbids us to trust God's own handwriting on the tablets of nature, how can she expect the present age to accept the revelations which hav come down to it through the distorting medium of human faculties.—Rev. James T. Bixby.

IT is only by means of superstition that a rude people can be induced to support, and a robber soldiery to respect, an intellectual class. But after a certain time this alliance must be ended, or harm will surely come. The boy must leave the apartments of the women when he arrives at a certain age. Theology is an excellent nurse, but a bad mistress for grown-up minds. The essence of religion is inertia; the essence of science is change. It is the function of the one to preserve, it is the function of the other to improve. If, as in Egypt, they are firmly chained together, either science will advance, in which case the religion will be altered; or the religion will preserve its purity and science will congeal.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

MOST of the myths of the ancients had a grain of fact mingled with the fiction. The last feat of Bacchus was performed on a voyage to Naxos. He hired a ship belonging to pirates, who instead of landing at Naxos steered toward Asia to sell him there as a slave. Thereupon Bacchus changed the masts and oars into serpents and himself into a lion; ivy grew around the vessel, and the sound of flutes was heard on every side; the sailors, seized with madness, leaped into the sea and were changed into dolphins. Now Bacchus is supposed to be the productiv and intoxicating power of nature, and wine is called the natural symbol of this power, and the "fruit of Dionysus" (or Bacchus) and wine creates madness, and hence the origin of the myths of Bacchus.—Elmina D. Slenker.

I REMEMBER an excellent little portraiture of Methodism from Irving on a green knoll where he had loosely sat down. "Not a good religion, sir," said he, confidentially shaking his head in answer to my question; "far too little of spiritual conscience, far too much of temporal appetite, goes hunting and watching after its own emotions, that is, mainly in the nervous system; an essentially sensuous religion, depending on the body, not on the soul!" "Fit only for a gross and vulgar-minded people," I perhaps added; "a religion so-called, and in the essence of it principally cowardice or hunger, terror of pains and appetite for pleasure, both carried to the Infinit;" to which he would sorrowfully assent in a considerable degree.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

THE reason why the Bible should not be read in the schools is, not that religion and morality are out of place there, but simply because the Bible represents the principle of authority over mental and spiritual freedom; because it would not be read as other books are for purely educational purposes, but would introduce the denial of that freedom to judge and reject which is the basis of education. This is not disregard to its merits. Its immortal best sentences ought to be read in the school just as soon as they shall be put on the same level in every respect with other great sayings of similar purport in Plutarch and Plato, in the Avesta and the Veda, such universality being the only possible evidence that no Bibliocracy is intended. Put an ideal desire of free personal conviction and broadcast growth into the school system, and the vexing question of religious teaching is solved.—Rev. Sam. Johnson.

Odds and Ends.

THE fishery question: Got a bite?

THE angel Gabriel will be the last authority on poker. He will raise all creation first and then call the crowd.

SWEET breeezes now the grasses woo;
The matron now the hen doth shoo;
The plumber and the sky are blue.

FROM Texas to Jersey he moved. Then he cursed! For the last state of that man was worse than the first.

A METHODIST preacher in Connecticut is reported as saying that there will not be as many Congregationalists in heaven as there are icicles in the other place.

THE legislators of Maine are an honest set. They say that there is not money enough in the state to corrupt them. Recent travelers through Maine state that this is true.

AFTER the officials of a Kansas town had vainly endeavored to disperse a mob, a minister mounted a box and made the simple announcement, "A collection will now be taken up." The result can be easily guessed.

A MAN hit a clergyman last week and afterward apologized and asked him for the change of a quarter. The clergyman gave it to him and soon after found that the quarter was bad. This is another case of returning good for evil.

A MAN in Schuylkill county, who suffered intense pain from inflammatory rheumatism, recently tried the Knock chapel plaster cure, and has not experienced a particle of pain for two weeks. Only a few days ago he left his bed for the first time in two years and visited the cemetery. He rode in a hearse.

BOSTON girls hav their arms lathered and shaved before going to parties. Then with short sleeves they look too sweet for anything. And when they put their arms around their fellow's neck there is no tickling, but a steady, soft, velvety, pulsating circle of comfort, and the young man proposes in less than four weeks.

How doth ye pious Feejee man
His missionary take?
Or toast or frizzled in a pan
Or else him doth he bake?

How takes ye gentle Nihilist
His czar he loves so well?
He peppers him if he resist
Or takes him on the shell.

AN English minister was once catechizing his young parishioners before the congregation, when he put the usual question to a stout girl whose father kept a public house; "What is your name?" No reply. The question having been repeated, the girl replied: "Nane o' your fun, Mr.—, ye ken my name weel enough. D'ye no say, when ye come to our house on a night, 'Bet, bring me some ale?'" The congregation assumed a broad grin, while the parson looked foolish.

DID HE TWIT HER?

"Do you love me, Sweet?" was the wail he wole,
As he pressed her close to his heart's wild throbbing;
"Does love's fierce tide irrigate your soul?
Is your heart with mine simultaneous bobbing?"
Her soulful eyes flew up to his face,
And pierced his own with their lovely glitter;
Then soft she murmured, with witching grace:
"Do I love you George? Well, I should twitter!"

'TIS NOW.

'Tis now the rug
Resigns the bug,
The latter seeks the ug-
Ly pug.
The maiden paints upon the mug,
And every fellow now doth slug
The foaming Bock from yellow jug;
The little boys all try the tug
Of war, and gardens now are dug:
The dog now grabs the Billy's lug,
And now the young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of hug. —Tennyson.

"YES, I knew him," the Texas sheriff remarked, when somebody asked him about Redhanded Bill; "I never met him but once; he came down here last February, riding another man's mule, and he came in and left the measure of his neck with me for a lariat."

"Did you fit him?" asked the traveler.

"Not very well," said the sheriff; "the blamed thing was too tight; but he never said anything after he tried it on, so I didn't change it."

And then the committee rose and reported the bill to the house, which shortly afterward took a recess until the evening session.—Burlington Hawkeye.

LYRICS OF LOCALITY.

A timid young man in Macomb
Took a beautiful maid to her home.
The bulldog was loose,
Kind words were no use,
So up an oak tree he did roam.

A noble young man in Momence
Loved a maiden with ardor intense.
Her cruel pa's boot
Obliged him to scoot
Through the back yard and over the fence.

A love-stricken youth in Oshkosh
Said unto his sweetheart, "By gosh,
I'm your own dearest feller;
Shake me not, Arabella,
Or I'll marry a girl in Cohosh."

A late married Saginaw man
Was disturbed by a concert of can,
So he took his duck gun,
And shot through the lung
A frolicsome banger of pan.

A youth on West Washington Square
Fell in love with a damosel fair.
Oh! if he had known
Not a tooth was her own,
And likewise her figure and hair.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 19. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, May 7, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

ARE Christians increasing? The population of Chicago has increased 70 per cent in ten years, and membership in the churches only 12 per cent.

THE Rev. Joseph Blum, a Jewish rabbi of high standing in Michigan, eloped with a widow, and was pursued to Chicago, where he was arrested.

LOTTA DARLING is a clairvoyant at Lawrence, Mass., but her sight was not strong enough to discern the approach of her husband while another man was kissing her, or a fight might hav been prevented.

PARSON NEWMAN said in a recent sermon that the true Christian is a living, walking heaven; the sinner is a living, walking hell. Possibly the parson has better perceptions than other people. Common folks can see very little difference between Christians and sinners.

CHRIST church (English), of Belleville, Ont., was destroyed by fire. The new organ placed in the church recently and valued at $3,500 was also destroyed. The church was valued at $50,000. Insurance on the organ and church $5,000.

A SKEPTICAL Frenchman writes to the Prefect of Police at Paris that all the asserted discoveries in regard to trichinæ are mere inventions of vegetarians, and he offers to prove it by living for three days off nothing but pork that is alleged to be diseased if the prefect will supply the meat.

THE Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke, of Boston, says, "I discredit the extravagant statements which giv intemperance as the root of all crime in this country, and maintain that there is a steady growth of temperate habits among the people as compared with the eustoms of a few generations ago."

THE Presbyterian church of Red Bank has recently suffered a "bolt" from its membership. About fifteen members hav already gone, and others will probably soon follow. The trouble arose over the pastor, the Rev. F. R. Harbaugh. It is alleged by those who do not like him that his sermons come from the head, and not from the heart.

CHICAGO has a Mormon church, founded by the followers of the original Joseph Smith, but it does not countenance polygamy, and claims that the following passage was in the unmutilated Book of Mormons: "Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the words of the Lord: for there shall not any man among you hav save it be one wife, and concubines he shall hav none, for I, the Lord God, delighteth in the chastity of woman."

THE Rev. O. M. Cqusins said in a sermon at Portland, Me., that every member of his congregation was a "cider guzzler," and is to be tried for it by his conference. A revivalist gave almost as much offense at Fairfield, Iowa. He said it was frivolous for women to wear feathers in their hats, whereupon two girls left the house with feathers flying. The preacher called after them: "This is God's granary; there goes the chaff; thank God the wheat remains."

A CENTRAL AMERICAN Indian has an article in El Porvenir of Guatemala supporting the theory of Humboldt that the vanquished red men and their Spanish conquerors were primevally of the same race. The Indians, he thinks, wandered from the common fatherland on the plains of Tartary to the western continent by way of Behring Strait. He adduces many facts to prove the high scientific attainment of the early American nations, and incidentally notes that the Aztec calendar was more perfect than the Roman.

RESPECTFUL obedience to church authority is rarely lacking among Roman Catholics, and the case of St. Peter's church, at Brownsburg, Ind., is therefore singular. Father Donovan refused to raise the money to pay a church debt, though ordered by Bishop Chatard to do so, and the bishop promptly excommunicated him. The priest dutifully closed the church for two months, but last Sunday, sustained by his whole congregation, he resumed the regular services. "For the time being," he remarked, "we will report directly to the heavenly throne, without asking for the mediation of that fellow [Bishop Chatard] at Vincennes."

THE old world is unpeopling itself on our shores. Nearly sixty thousand immigrants arrived in the month just ended, at Castle Garden alone. Boston, Baltimore, and other ports no doubt hav thousands more to add to this volume, which surpasses anything ever known in the history of the country. Tyranny, crushing taxation, military oppression, bad crops, grasping landlords, governmental spy systems, and laws that repress hopes of advancement, contrasted with the freedom and the prospect of happiness offered on this side of the ocean, are doubtless the causes of this vast wave of immigration.

A MINISTER who was candidating in hope of receiving a call found his hopes dashed into bitter disappointment by reason of two bad habits into which he had fallen. He pulled off his boots and sat in his stocking feet before the fire at houses where he was entertained. He also spent a large part of his time while not actually engaged in eating in picking his teeth, performing this operation in an unsightly manner. The people to whom this brother preached thought that, although his theology was sound and his oratory reasonably attractiv, they could do better by looking a little further in the hope of securing a pastor who was free from these peculiarities.

A DESPATCH from Victoria, B. C., says: "Methodist circles are stirred by the secession from the communion of the Rev. A. H. Smith, Superintendent of Missions, and head of the church in the province. Some weeks ago Smith delivered a course of sermons in which he declared his disbelief in the doctrin of eternal punishment. Last night, at the annual district meeting of the body, the Rev. Mr. Smith took the chair, and, after devotional exercises, objection was raised to the doctrinal views which he had announced during the year from the pulpit. The Rev. Mr. Smith stated that he was no longer to be bound by the close standard of the church, and tendered his resignation as a member of that body, which was accepted, and he withdrew from the meeting. It is said that he will be followed by a number of his congregation, and that an independent church will be established.

"WHAT is the ante?" whispered a Red Gulch miner with a single $20 gold piece to the deacon with the collection plate in the Baptist church at Black Run, Col. He was told to contribute whatever he chose, whereupon he said he'd chip in a dollar, and proceeded to take $19 in change. The deacon softly replied that no change was given. A struggle ensued, the plate was upset, and the congregation was in the act of "jumping the deacon's claim," when the minister, an old Californian, leaned over the pulpit with a large navy revolver and observed: "The brethren will please take notice that I've got the drop on them, and any brother who declines to go to his seat or who touches any of that money will hav a funeral at his house to-morrow at 2 o'clock, P.M. Our mining friend from Red Gulch will kindly release the deacon's threat, or he is a dead man." The twenty-dollar gold piece went to save the heathen.—Leadville News.

KENTUCKIANS pride themselvs as much on their orthodoxy as on their whisky, their horseflesh, and their handiness with firearms, hence it required no little courage or no little rashness for the Rev. Frank D. Moore, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Covington, to go into his pulpit and tell his astonished elders and congregation that the Sunday law of the state was all wrong, that ordinary pleasure-taking on the first day of the week was not sinful, and that the so-called Christian Sabbath was without warrant in scripture. For these and the like utterances his presbytery censured him at the time, and has now suspended him from all the functions of the gospel ministry. Before sentence was passed he rejected with scorn the advise given him, as he asserts, by some of his clerical brethren to go on peaceably and comfortably and leave the Sunday question alone. He also gave notice that if his ordination vows bound him to obediently discover in the Bible all the dogmatic definitions of the Confession of Faith, and not to find anything else there, then he recanted the vows. Mr. Moore is popular in Covington, and it seems to be expected that he will now imitate the example of the Rev. Prof. Swing, the Rev. Dr. Thomas, and other estrayed orthodox pulpiteers, by setting up a church of his own.

BRADLAUGH'S PROSPECTS. — Although Mr. Bradlaugh has for the second time been returned to Parliament by the votes of Northampton, and though he presented himself before the House of Commons and expressed a readiness to take the prescribed oath, his bitter and bigoted Christian enemies seem determined to oppose his admission to the seat to which he is justly entitled. Upon his declining to retire from the House he was twice led below the bar of the House by the sergeant-at-arms. Fortunately Mr. Bradlaugh is not a man easily deterred from his duty, nor is he readily frightened by the most intolerant bigots that ever drew the breath of life. Not a little excitement is aroused in England over the case. Premier Gladstone has given notice that he will introduce a bill to allow members to affirm who object to taking the oath. If this bill becomes a law it should admit Mr. Bradlaugh or any other Freethinker to a seat to which he may be justly entitled. This contest may be continued for many months, but it is believed that Mr. Bradlaugh will ultimately triumph over his enemies and that he will ultimately render impossible a recurrence of such arbitrary injustices as he now experiences. May the contest result in good, and the right come uppermost.

HARD TALK ABOUT A SHEPHERD.—Mr. Jas. H. Campbell, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Michigan Legislature and member of a Christian church uses the following language in reference to Father Callaert: "He is a notorious, shameless, malicious liar. He has been sued for slander and been compelled to retract. He is grossly dishonest, an extortioner, who has exacted exorbitant payments from poor widows and orphans for funeral masses, and a consummate hypocrit. He is a priest from purely mercenary motivs, and only for the opportunities it givs him to get an easy living, and dupe sincere people out of their money. He has vilified the living and the dead, and prostituted everything sacred, even the sacraments of the church, to his malicious ends. He is addicted to the use of liquor, is an ignorant, vicious, malicious, thoroughly degraded, and depraved wretch. Any one who will look at his bloated, discolored, swinish face as he skulks about the streets, can tell what he is, and yet he is retained there against the express wish of the people, who must submit to him and attend his mass or be called non-Catholics. Many, however, who hav been lifelong, devout Catholics, very properly look upon his mass as being no more sacred than a cat fight, and absent themselvs from all church services conducted by him. The idea that the exercise of any priestly function by such a person is of any effect is supremely ridiculous. To the many excellent, sincerely Christian priests there is no fear of trouble from the people; the Catholic people can be safely trusted. Bad priests should hav no such authority and power as they now possess." The report was listened to attentivly, and is the leading topic of conversation in legislativ and other circles.

News of the Week.

THE project of the World's Fair is about given up.

ALL of the street-car drivers of St. Louis are on strike.

Two mutinies occurred on ships lying in this harbor last week.

SIX thousand immigrants arrived at this port one day last week.

WM. C. CONNER, ex-sheriff of New York county, died on the 26th ult.

EMILE DE GIRARDEN, the well-known French journalist, died on the 27th ult.

GREAT floods hav occurred in Minnesota, and many villages and railroads are submerged.

A PRISONER in the state prison at Concord, N. H., sawed his hand off to get rid of work.

GARFIELD announces his determination to stand by Robertson, and the deadlock still continues.

JOHN DILLON, the Irish agitator, has been arrested by the English government for seditious utterances.

THE largest steamship cylinder in the world was cast by John Roach at the Morgan Iron works last week.

THIRTY-THREE school children were washed from a ferry boat at Elgin, Ill., and twenty of them drowned, last week.

THE steamer Chesapeake went ashore on Fisher's Island, off New London, Ct., and was totally wrecked. No lives were lost.

Two men were burned to death and several badly injured at the burning of a box factory in Greenpoint, L. I., on the 26th ult.

THE New York Assembly has passed a bill ordering the telegraph wires below 42d street in this city to be placed under ground.

THE police commissioners of this city hav been indicted by the grand jury and are to be tried for dereliction of duty in not cleaning the streets.

A MOVEMENT against the Jews has broken out in Argenau, West Prussia. A mob attacked the houses of several Jews and maltreated the inmates.

THREE thousand bakers of this city struck for and obtained an advance of $4 per week and a reduction in working hours from fifteen to twelve, on Monday.

PARLIAMENT refuses to let Bradlaugh take the oath. It is probable, however, that some bill will be introduced by Gladstone before the session is over that will admit him.

OWING to political chicanery the city of Troy, N. Y., was without a police force last week. Merchants and bankers hired special watchmen to protect their property.

SIX jars, each containing the body of an infant, were dug up by a lot of boys at Harrison, N. J. It is thought that infanticide has been practiced by wholesale by some physician.

PHILADELPHIA had a $700,000 fire on the 28th ult. The Girard Point elevator, the largest in the country, and storage warehouse were totally destroyed. Ninety-seven thousand bushels of grain were burnt.

THE bey of Tunis and the French government are at loggerheads over a railway, and war between them is not improbable. A column of French soldiers hav already invaded Tunis, and some fighting has taken place.

AN attempt to evict some Irish tenants at Limerick was frustrated by the populace; who threatened to kill the bailiff. Five hundred police and military were present, but were unable to do anything with the mob. A bailiff named King at Galway was recently seized by a party of disguised men and held over a fire till he promised to let tenants alone in future. He will probably die.

Liberty and Purity: How to Secure Both Safely, Effectively, and Impartially.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK IN OPPOSITION TO A BILL TO LARGELY INCREASE THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, MARCH 23, 1881.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN, OF THE BAR OF NEW YORK.

CONCLUDED.

To use it as a test of obscenity is simply monstrous, for everything could be condemned under it from the Bible down to the New York Herald. Under such a test there is no measure of guilt but the bigotry of the court or jury. In the Court where that test prevails, and only there, can the Agent boast that "in this court we always convict."

This mode of test is right in the teeth of the common law, which gives no iron-bound definition or test, but leaves each case to be judged of BY THE JURY according to the facts, the definition of the court being only advisory and not binding upon them. Thus each case is to be decided upon the common sense of the jury, and their judgment of the necessity of enforcing the law, under the facts and circumstances as shown.

These extracts and the affidavits and facts I have shown reveal the motive and intent of this Agent, while this loose "test" can cover any expression he might wish to include under it.

But, further, the avowals of the Agent justified, and still justify, the worst Liberal suspicions. In his Report of 1878, he expressly says, "Another class of publications, issued by Freelovers and Freethinkers, is in a fair way of being stamped out."

The affidavits of Messrs. Crocker and Colyer show plainly what such sentences refer to and how they were to be realized by stamping out THE TRUTH SEEKER.

STATE, CITY, AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.

Be it known to all men that I, George R. Colyer, being duly sworn, depose and say that I belonged to the firm of Crocker & Colyer, which existed three or four years ago. We did a good deal of printing for D. M. Bennett, including THE TRUTH SEEKER, a good many books and pamphlets, and other works. We printed the petitions to Congress which were signed and sent to that body in the winter of 1877–78, together with the accompanying explanatory circulars. The firm name of Crocker & Colyer was printed on that circular, and that with my knowledge and by the consent of my partner, Mr. Crocker.

After the same had been issued, Anthony Comstock, in company with his assistant, Joseph A. Britton, came to my place of business and by threats of prosecution, imprisonment, and heavy fine induced me to sign a paper he had drawn up to the effect that Bennett had used the name of Crocker & Colyer without our consent, although he had learned from Mr. Crocker that such consent had been obtained.

Comstock repeatedly threatened me with prosecution, fines, and imprisonment if we continued to do work for Mr. Bennett. This was continued to such length that I was not a little disturbed and alarmed in my mind, particularly as I had sustained heavy pecuniary loss. Under these conditions was it that Comstock by his terrorism and threats induced me to sign the paper he had drawn up. He exhibited a good deal of spite toward Mr. Bennett on several occasions, trying his utmost to deter us by alarming threats from doing his work, and more than once said with much vehemence, "I will have D. M. Bennett in state prison before a year passes away."

GEORGE R. COLYER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me the 4th day of April, 1881.

A. B. CAMPBELL, Notary Public, Kings and N. Y. Counties.

But he left no doubt about it. He openly said he would revive the laws against blasphemy. He went about from city to city, and in Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, as well as New York, made public threats to this effect, as I have collected from those who heard them.

Before his auxiliary Vice Society in Boston Comstock, in giving out the programme of his future proceedings, made the threat or boast that as soon as Heywood and Bennett were thoroughly disposed of he would turn his attention to the Boston Investigator and the Banner of Light. In a private meeting of his auxiliary society in Rochester, after boasting of what he had accomplished, he made the prediction, in a swaggering style, that Freethought or Infidel publications and Infidel tracts would soon be circulated no more. He is reported as having made similar threats or assertions before his societies at Chicago, Cincinnati, and St. Louis.

Were the Liberals to lie still until this revolver-armed Agent should ride rough-shod over their necks? Every other sect and body were utterly prostrated. They alone could have checked, and, in the end, will remove this, the greatest danger that has arisen to "the grand institutions of free America" since the Rebellion.

The time will come when America will honor the majority of the Liberals who stood firm for Liberty and Purity in this crisis and through all evil report.

Nor, as I have said, let any one blame those Liberals who fell out of the ranks. No human courage can face a discharge from the Mephitis Americana.

That there has been honest difference among Liberals on the subject, and much virulence and detraction, he has taken much space in his book to show, but to no purpose.

Some of those who, with Col. Ingersoll, politically differed as to the repeal of the United States Laws have preserved their consistency by withdrawing from the League. Those who favor the centralization of the general government may not care for repeal, but only wish the United States Postal Laws modified.

But when the Agent speaks of forty-two Leagues as having seceded at Syracuse, this is another specimen of his untruthfulness, for (as he well knew) after six months' effort they could only get up eight Leagues, and they have all returned to the fold or gone out into nothingness, and so it is doubly useless to speak of them. There is nothing left of them all now. When the Gods cease to be just they cease to be Gods. When Liberals betray liberty they cease to be Liberals Oblivion awaits them.

I cannot close without reference to another branch of this Agent's injustice—that is, to those physicians who are independent and fearless enough to stand outside of the Doctor's Trade Union. Not that this Union, like the Bar Association among Lawyers, is not a good and useful Association, but it is well that some lawyers and doctors should stand outside of such close corporations and advertise and serve the public without the restraints of the narrower schools within those great professions. Many of our greatest and best surgeons and physicians have chosen so to do. The Agent regards them as his especial prey and plunder. He has in his book, and before you, made a special attack upon Dr. E. B. Foote of our city. I have the affidavit of this physician, which shows again how useless it is to attribute veracity to this dispenser of Law and punishment. (See Appendix). He produces before you a pessary and piston, which this physician used in his practice and recommended for a certain purpose which he deemed to be medically, morally, and socially beneficent.

Many of the most enlightened men of our age have come to a similar conclusion, to wit, that the extension of human science, prudence, and civilization to the lower end of the spinal column and its environs, is the best way, indeed, the only way, to remove the evils that lurk there, and which are among the greatest curses of the human race.

This Agent has succeeded in getting the United States Government, by its Post-Office, and a great many States by their laws to generally and stupidly declare that this shall not be done under terrible penalties.

The regular physicians he does not molest, but the Independents he follows with the terror of his law. A most atrocious case of an obscene publication from a regular medical house he would not touch, but Dr. Foote had to pay $3,500 and barely escaped a prison cell.

Thus this law is applied only to those whom he wishes to destroy. For instance, it was well known that Mr. Colgate, the President of this very society, was issuing in large quantities a circular, among other things, recommending his "Vaseline" for this very purpose. A would-be rival of this Agent sent to that President's firm a "test" (not decoy, oh, no!) letter, and received by mail the circular with Mr. Colgate's firm superscription, etc. He presented it to the same U. S. authorities who had prosecuted Dr. Foote, and demanded that the law be enforced. They of course declined. Had Mr. Colgate been a Liberal and Mr. Agent the prosecutor, who does not know that the result would have been different?

Here is the very pamphlet and the stamped envelope, and here the passage on page 7, which is too plain to quote, but which advises that "in some cases prevention is better than cure," and that "Vaseline, charged with four or five grains of salicylic acid, will destroy spermatozoa without injury," etc.

Now Dr. Foote says that this Colgatean remedy is a delusion and a snare, and that the only safe thing is his pessary. Doctors differ—I don't know. But this I do know, that this Agent reëlects Mr. Colgate as the perennial President of his society, and sends Dr. Foote under the shadow of a prison to pay a ruinous fine!

Translate this Colgate case into Comstockese, and how amusing to the knowing and yet horrible to the innocent would his tons of circulars flourish as "tons of obscene and immoral matter!" That is just the way his cases and statistics are made up.

What is the motive of these partial prosecutions of physicians? Plainly to buy the support of the "regular" medical profession to his methods by prosecuting the "irregulars."

It is a cunningly devised trick, and has succeeded quite largely. Thus he seeks to annex vested "respectable" interests to his power. He boasts before you that he is backed by $50,000,000 worth of real estate. He has many of the religious sects, the United States government, and some State authorities to do his bidding from year to year. The regular doctors are wooed by his prosecutions of the irregulars, and even the Masonic fraternity and other societies he seeks to use for his purposes.*

*I am informed that all of his efforts to annex the Masons have failed. Year after year he has sought admission at the Lodge, but has wooed and cooed in vain. The brothers have investigated ad nauseam, and the reply is, No, no! His true history can never be known, for the soft and amiable side he has revealed to them is lost under their veil. It is too bad that they are a secret order.

I might continue this exposure for hours, but I know it is tiresome and disgusting. Every time I touch it I hope never to be compelled to do so again. I feel as Harriet Martineau said about her opposition to the English "Contagious Disease" Acts, that she trembled in private to think what duty compelled her to say in public. But those who know the facts are "called" to do this work and to keep on doing it until it is effectual. But I pray you to let this be the last of such necessities.

Nor would I close without repeating, as I always do, words of justice and respect to the motives of many of the members of and contributors to this society. That they are good, patriotic, and sincere I gladly acknowledge. They have undertaken to do the right thing, but it must be done, indeed, can only be safely, effectively, and impartially done, by doing it in the right way.

Nor less would I repeat that much good has been done by this society, which, however, might better have been done by secular officers. Perhaps many of the parties referred to in Mr. Bennett's book should have been punished. But this society makes crime by its decoys and by the opposition it excites. Phariseeism is unavoidable in its management. We appeal from our modern Pharisees to the ideal Christ whose name they seek to bear. Only the Liberals, who are supposed to deny his name, realize his spirit. The corner-stone and object of the Liberal League is his command "to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." He only condemned those who made a business of condemning others. The spirit of humanity he made the sum and substance of all law. "Love thy neighbor as thyself;" "Do unto others even as ye would that others should do unto you;" "The smoking flax he would not quench, the bruised reed he would not break." "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more."

Turn from such sentiments to this Agent's book, and you find the name of God and the spirit of Hell. He is of those of whom the Apostle speaks, "Who do evil that good may come, whose damnation is just."

What right has he to cantingly talk about "his blessed Savior?" Should that Savior return to the earth he would find his labors, and also his friends, not among the Pharisees, but as of old among the "Infidels," the poor, the oppressed, the publicans and sinners. Let this society be compelled to imitate his mission on earth as a moral and beneficent persuasive power for good, as our bill provides.

Strip from it and its Agent the accusing sword, that only the secular officer should bear, and give it the power to bear to the miserable, the depraved, and the vicious, by its words, aid, and example, the idea of a higher and purer life on earth, if such it has to impart.

In this way only can you reconcile and bind all our citizens together in the support of just and needful laws. The law will then give us, safely and effectively, because impartially, the blessings of both LIBERTY and PURITY.

AFFIDAVITS AND STATEMENTS.

CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.

D. M. Bennett, duly sworn, deposes and says: I feel that Anthony Comstock has deeply wronged me in his book "Frauds Exposed," not long since given to the public (as he has also seriously wronged me in other ways), and I wish to make a statement of facts regarding the matter in which he charges me with forgery.

In November, 1877, he caused my arrest by a United States marshal and took me before a U. S. Commissioner and placed me under bonds. The offense was dropping in the mail two little tracts I had published, among many others, the first a series of questions, entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," the second a short essay written for The Popular Science Monthly on the mode by which marsupial animals are propagated. The arrest was made under an act, the passage of which he (Comstock) procured through Congress in March, 1873.

Feeling that as an American citizen I had a perfect right to publish the two tracts, that I had an undoubted right to sell them, and to transmit them by mail precisely as any other printed matter, I not only considered myself aggrieved, but looked upon the act under which it was sought to send me to prison and disgrace me for life as a wrong piece of legislation which ought to be repealed. With this view and with the aid of friends I got up a petition to Congress, asking that the law be repealed. These I had printed in considerable numbers and sent them to many persons for signatures. Explanatory of the character of the act or acts under which this wrong was sought to be done me, and the necessity of making an effort to have the objectionable acts repealed, I also got up a circular calculated for that purpose. I added to this the names of several friends whom I knew to be in sympathy with the effort I was making, and also of several firms in the city whom I conceived had an interest in the matter in the same direction with myself. I had a few proof sheets taken of both the petition and the explanatory circular and with them visited each firm whose name I had thus inserted and laid before them the effort I had undertaken. I left with each firm a copy of both the circular and the petition showing their names as they there stood. Some objected to their names being used, but the principal part did not object. Those who objected and said they did not want their names used I removed, and those who did not object I regarded as consenting and their names I let remain. I will repeat, I left copies with all having their names on.

I had prolonged conversation with some and briefer conversation with others. Some I found too much occupied to give me full attention. I put in the best part of a day in calling upon those parties, and on some I called two or three times. I had left with each copies of both the circular and petition, with their names attached, and deeming their interest in the unjust law almost identical with my own, and as they did not object to the use of their names, I allowed them to remain. If in this I did wrong nobody can regret it more than myself. But most assuredly I had no intention of committing forgery; I did not for a moment think I was forging, and am positive that I committed no forgery in fact or intent.

When Comstock saw the names of the firms attached to the circular, he visited some of them in a very angry manner, as several of them subsequently informed me, and threatened them with prosecution and used other modes of the terrorism, which he is so capable of exercising, and several of the parties were induced from the fact that they had not written their names to disavow the right to use them, after they had positively authorized me to use their names. I will say here that I asked none of the parties to sign a paper or document, not deeming it of consequence enough to ask them to write their names. I merely, upon showing them the circular, asked them to allow their names to be so used, and they did so in the manner I have stated.

Anthony Comstock has injured me deeply in other ways. He made repeated efforts with my printers to frighten them and to induce them not to do my work. He threatened prosecution, and used other terrorizing threats, and this both before and after he had succeeded in placing me in prison, although at my trial he swore positively that he had not done so. He has grossly distorted the truth in the book he has published. I am very certain I can point out and positively prove not less than fifty material falsehoods published in that volume if it were worth while to bother with it further, which I think it is not. D. M. BENNETT.

New York, March 23, 1881.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 23d day of March, 1881. FREDERICK G. KING,

Notary Public in and for the County of New York.

STATE, CITY, AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.

Albert L. Rawson on being duly sworn says: I have been shown a statement in Mr. Comstock's book "Frauds Exposed," in these words:

"JANUARY 3, 1878.

"Mr. Bennett used my name without consulting me, saying to me afterward that he presumed I would not be offended."

"(Signed) A. L. RAWSON, 34 Bond street."

Mr. Comstock gives the impression in his book that Mr. Bennett had no right to use my name and did so improperly. I wish to say that this impression is wholly false. I was then president of the Defense Committee, one of whose objects it was to do the very thing Mr. Bennett was trying to do by this circular, and the purpose and object of which I had approved before him time and time again, so that he was perfectly authorized and justified in using my name. Mr. Comstock has done him and me a gross wrong in publishing the above statement as though the use of my name was improper or that I ever so said or thought.

Mr. Comstock came to me about the date of the above statement with the circular in question which I had not before seen in print, and showed me my name to it. He said that it contained false and libelous matter, and that I would certainly be prosecuted unless I disavowed it. He threatened in the most violent and determined manner. I told him on the spot that Mr. Bennett had not consulted me before he put my name there, but had told me of it, and said that he presumed I would not be offended. I also then and there stated that I had no objection to my name remaining there, because I believed that Mr. Bennett was substantially correct in what he had said, and that I would not withdraw my name.

He wanted a statement to the effect that I had not been consulted before my name was used as to the fact that it would be put in the circular. I told him that such was the fact, but that I had no objection to its remaining. He was at work at me from half to three-quarters of an hour, and I was in ill health and desirous of being relieved from his presence and threats. I have no recollection of signing the statement he publishes, and I have stated and do now believe that I did never sign it. If I did, which seems to me impossible, I did it at his dictation, and it is his work and not mine.

Afterward I read the circular, and although there are a few mistakes in it, they seem to me trivial, and I told Mr. Bennett that I did in no wise object to the use of my name, as I had told Mr. Comstock, and which fact he has wholly and wrongfully and most unjustly suppressed.

A. L. RAWSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of April, 1881. HENRY K. THOMAE,

Notary Public, Kings Co., N. Y. Certified in New York courts.

STATE, CITY, AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.:

I, Dwight C. Crocker, of the city and county of New York, now in the employ of the Spectator Company, at 16 Dey st., said city, do hereby depose and swear: That during the winter of 1877 and 1878 I was engaged in the business of printing at 85 Center street, New York city, under the firm name of "Crocker & Colyer;" that, among other patrons, was Mr. D. M. Bennett, for whom said firm did printing; that Crocker & Colyer did, at that time, presswork (weekly) on said Bennett's publication, known as THE TRUTH SEEKER, along with other miscellaneous works; that among this miscellaneous work was a circular in reference to the repeal of the Comstock Postal Laws of 1873, issued by said D. M. Bennett, to which said Crocker and Colyer, as a firm, willingly consented that their names be used as petitioners. That afterwards George R. Colyer, then a member of said firm of Crocker & Colyer, and during the period these circulars were in circulation, did, through fear or terrorism, and by threats made by one Anthony Comstock, deny that the firm name of said Crocker & Colyer was freely given to said D. M. Bennett as a signature to said circular.

I also swear that during said winter, on two separate occasions, if not more, said Anthony Comstock did personally warn me to cease printing said TRUTH SEEKER under pain of prosecution and threats of punishment.

DWIGHT C. CROCKER.

Sworn to before me this 22d day of March, 1881,

HARRY OVERINGTON, Com. Deeds, N. Y. City.

STATEMENT OF Z. C. WARREN,

FORMERLY OF THE FIRM OF WARREN, BARNES & CO.

Mr. Warren is not now residing in the State; were he still living in the city an affidavit could doubtless be obtained from him. He writes thus:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., March 28, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: Comstock had no right to use my name in any of his statements to the public.

Yours truly, Z. C. WARREN.

In this connection it is only proper to state that Mr. Warren did give Mr. Bennett consent to use the firm name of Warren, Barnes & Co., on his circular; and one of these three things is the truth: 1. Warren did not give a statement to Comstock denying the fact of his giving his consent to Bennett; or, 2. If Warren did give such a statement, he forgot about giving consent to Bennett; or, 3. If Comstock obtained the denial from Warren, notwithstanding his consent to Bennett, he did it by threats and intimidation, as in the case of Colyer.

D. M. BENNETT, Sir: In regard to your note I will say, in justice to you, that previous to your getting up your petition to Congress we had some talk about our firm signing it, and I told you I would sign any proper paper, and I have no doubt from this you felt justified in attaching our name to it without further consultation. At any rate, I never had the slightest idea you had committed a forgery, and do not think so now. It was merely a misunderstanding common among men. I am glad this whole thing is over, and hope now you can do your legitimate work, keep to the right, and go ahead.

Truly, M. L. HOLBROOK.

Dr. Holbrook's published statement as to Mr. Bennett is this: "He [Comstock] said he never had any trouble in arranging with respectable houses to stop advertising and selling obscene books; these other fellows [meaning Bennett and Heywood], damn 'em! or damn 'um! they are entitled to no mercy. He brought out these words with an emphasis and depth of feeling that I would call hate. I told him I did not agree with him."

In being afterward requested to state more particularly Dr. Holbrook added, "He said that he should show them no quarter, and this expression was more like that of a fiend than a man."

NEW YORK, April 22, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I received your favor some time last month requesting me to call upon Messrs. McKesson and Robbins in relation to their note to the New York Tribune, published December 29, 1877, and included in Mr. Comstock's book, as to the use of their names by you to a circular favoring the repeal of the Comstock Postal Law of 1873.

I have delayed answering because I intended to call upon those gentlemen as you wished, but I have been prevented by sickness and consequent unavoidable pressure of business.

I remember that I did call upon them as your counsel and at your request, immediately after that note or card was published in the Tribune, to offer any reparation in your power if any wrong or injury had been done. I saw both of the partners. It was very evident that one of them had not been informed as to what had been done or said with you by the other as to the circular previous to its issue, that the proof of the circular with their firm name to it had been presented to and left with one of them with the understanding that their names might be used upon certain conditions which it was evident you believed had been complied with.

It was plain that there was no forgery nor injury to repair, nor anything that needed further attention.

Yours very respectfully, ABRAM WAKEMAN.

To MR. D. M. BENNETT.

N. B.—Mr. Comstock admits in his book that he obtained all of these disavowals except that of McKesson & Robbins, but that, he intimates, was printed before he called upon them. But did not Mr. Colgate or some of his friends or society instigate that card? Such is Mr. Bennett's information and belief; and then that card was used to obtain the others. When this Agent is so ingenuous as to boast that he has not done a thing, those who know his "childlike" way know pretty surely that he had some one to do it for him.

Mr. J. W. Bouton also, at Mr. Comstock's request, gave a statement that the use of his name at the foot of the circular was unauthorized. This was true, as it was in the case of Prof. Rawson; but Mr. Bouton had expressed himself as opposed to the postal law repeatedly. He afterward attended upon Mr. Bennett's trial voluntarily as one of his witnesses. The proof of the circular with his name attached to it was delivered to and left with him as with the other cases, and as he never made any objections before or after the publication, the question of "forgery" is about as ridiculous as it could be.

AS TO THE NEW YORK NEWS COMPANY.

NEW YORK, April 23, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I called at your request to see the New York News Company in regard to the statement signed by their treasurer in Mr. Comstock's book disavowing the use of their name to the circular of Mr. Bennett as to the Comstock postal laws and which was issued in December, 1877.

I was informed by the treasurer that Mr. Bennett had before the issue of the circular called upon them with a proof sheet with their names thereto, and left the same with him, for he afterward found it when inquiry was made about it.

Mr. Bennett, as I am told, claims that he understood that if they objected word was to have been sent to him. As to that no one at the company has any recollection at this distance of time.

No such word was sent so far as I can learn.

It is plain from the statements made that there was and could have been at most nothing more than a misunderstanding, and that the word forgery has no application to the matter whatever.

To Mr. T. B. Wakeman. E. N. DOLL.

In order to be sure that there was no mistake about this letter I called and read it to Mr. Rhodes, the treasurer, and he acknowledged that the facts were stated correctly.

T. B. W.

The foregoing affidavits and letters completely dispose of the claim of the Agent that these seven names (and these are all) were "UNAUTHORIZED AND A FORGERY," as he states in his large print.

There was not the shadow of a "forgery," and the "unauthorized" charge is a truth in the letter, but the sheerest falsehood in spirit and fact. But what shall be said of the fraud, terrorism, and duplicity that could obtain these disavowals as it is proved he did for instance in the affidavit of Mr. Colyer (page 71), and use them as he boasts he did to pull the wool over the eyes of a committee of Congress?

MR. BENNETT'S AFFIDAVIT

AS TO HIS SOLE AUTHORSHIP OF "ANTHONY COMSTOCK: HIS CAREER OF CRUELTY AND CRIME."

STATE, CITY, AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.

D. M. Bennett, being duly sworn, says: I am informed that Mr. Anthony Comstock stated before a Committee of the Legislature of this State that the little book published by me entitled "Anthony Comstock: His Career of Cruelty and Crime," is a tissue of falsehoods prepared or written by an abortionist who had made an attack upon him and an attempt to take his life.

This statement of Anthony is wholly untrue. I wrote every word of that book myself, as my clerks and the printers, who often waited for copy while I wrote it, well know, and as the style will attest to any one familiar with my writings.

Nor is it a tissue of falsehoods. The facts were collected and investigated by me carefully. I well knew that I would be prosecuted by Anthony if he could get hold of any misstatements, and so I was careful to state nothing but what I could prove by reliable witnesses.

The matter referred to in Anthony's book (pp. 411–413) has nothing to do with my book. I soon ascertained that the source from whence that matter was obtained was unreliable, and I rejected it wholly. Neither it nor its author had anything to do with my book. Out of half a dozen copies of a decoy letter sent out by Anthony to as many different parties, the copy received by the party indicated by Anthony, as I think, was sent to me and used, but he had nothing to do with the book whatever. D. M. BENNETT.

Sworn to before me this 16th day of April, 1881.

WM. H. DRAKE, Notary Public, New York county.

DR. FOOTE, SR.

The affidavit of Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., furnished for the Committee, is too lengthy to be printed here. It is a thorough vindication, and shows for the hundredth time how necessary it is to hear "the other side" before giving any weight whatever to the "Agent's" statements.

It is shown:

1. That Dr. Foote was the principal opponent of Mr. Comstock's legislation in New York at its beginning in 1872, long before the nature of this novel law-making was generally understood. That as a result, as the Doctor was informed by a member of Comstock's Society, he had incurred Comstock's displeasure, and certainly the Agent has pursued him persistently to the present time.

2. That he was arrested and convicted in the United States Court and fined $3,500 for a little work "sent in a sealed envelope, as first-class matter, in answer to a decoy letter purporting to come from a wife and mother living in Chicago." That the little work contained no matter that was within any law. Even reference to a medical appliance for married women, similar to, but an improvement upon, those in general use by reputable physicians, and commonly sold by druggists, then and now, had been carefully expurgated. That the appliance which it had formerly advised had never injured any one; indeed, was entirely harmless, and not at all adapted to immoral uses.

3. That knowing the determination of this Agent to destroy him if possible, the sale of all matters of this kind was, after the passage of the New York Comstock Law, removed to a branch office of the Doctor in Connecticut, so that there should be not even an apparent violation of any law of this state by him, even in regard to a matter that he considered in the highest degree healthful, right, merciful, and beneficent in the practice of his profession.

Contrary to these facts, the Agent represents:

1. That (page 427) there was a violation of the Laws of this state, which there never was.

2. That he compelled the Doctor "to suppress several thousand circulars, advertisements, and books that he was sending through the mails."

This is wholly false. No circulars, advertisements, or books were suppressed; nothing was done but to exclude from the mails the work above alluded to.

3. That the prosecution was for an "infamous and infernal" article, and effected good results. The facts are just the contrary. It has injured Dr. Foote without doing any possible good. The very appliance that the Doctor ceased to use was advertised by this prosecution, and thereupon pirated by others, and is more extensively used than ever by physicians and others.

So much for Dr. Foote. But we need to add, as to this last point, that these prosecutions generally result in effective advertisements.

In that way Mr. Comstock prosecuted, and so advertised, an article introduced by Dr. Chase, so that its sale has become very general, and thousands are used where one would have been without his aid.

So with "Cupid's Yokes;" he has raised the sale from one thousand to over fifty thousand; and I am told that not a day passes that it does not go through the mails.

Cannot these would-be censors learn that the attempt to put their censorship over the American people is just the way to make them do and have the very things the censors wish to prevent?

AFFIDAVIT OF Dr. FOOTE, Jr.

CITY, COUNTY, AND STATE OF NEW YORK: } ss

EDWARD B. FOOTE, JR., a regular practicing physician in the City of New York, being duly sworn, says:

That he has read pages 426 and 427 of "Frauds Exposed," bearing the name of Anthony Comstock as author.

That the speech put into his, the deponent's, mouth by the said Comstock, and the motives under which he, the deponent, labored before the Congressional Committee, are therein shamefully garbled and misrepresented.

That one significant episode bearing on the case of Dr. Foote, Sr., is prudently omitted, viz.: This deponent handed to said Comstock, when before the Congressional Committee, the condemned pamphlet, "Words in Pearl for the Married," the mailing of which as first class matter to one representing himself as a wife and mother, had cost Dr. Foote, Sr. a fine of $3,500, and challenged him then and there to point out to the Committee a single obscene passage in its pages; whereupon Comstock's face visibly reddened as he nervously turned the leaves for some moments, and until the Committee mercifully relieved him from his dilemma by resuming the business before it.

That when he speaks on page 427 of "eminent physicians in New York and Brooklyn" as opposing any change of the law in the "interest of this crew," he intimates that eminence and respectability are all on his side, whereas a petition largely signed by eminent physicians of the Homeopathic and Eclectic schools in New York and Brooklyn was, as he knows, sent to the New York Legislature asking for the modification of the law; and whereas a petition signed by about 70,000 respectable citizens of United States had been referred to the Congressional Committee, a large number of which signers were clergymen and members of orthodox churches, as well as eminent liberals, who disapprove of Comstock's methods, many of whom deponent personally knows. All of which statements are true according to the best knowledge and belief of this deponent. EDWARD B. FOOTE, JR.

Sworn to before me this 30th day of March, 1881.

SUMMARY.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE?

I. In the States.—1. The laws should be wholly executed by officers responsible to the people, upon information furnished by any society, postmaster, officer, or citizen whatsoever, without any special incorporation or privilege for that purpose.

2. The special Comstock societies to enforce the laws by their own agents should be abolished or have their functions limited to education and reform by moral persuasion.

3. The jury should be made the judges of the law and of the fact, and not be bound by any technical judicial definition, because no one definition can be safe or just. In this class of cases there can be no "test." The common-law jury and their discretion is our only recourse. Their average opinion is the best and the safest umpire (allowing for all risks and defects) that can be appealed to. There is no other escape from a moral and literary censorship of postmaster or judge or "agent;" and no other way of deciding such questions is in harmony with popular liberty and republican government.

II.—In the Federal or United States Government.—The Post-office should be run for postal purposes only, and not for any purpose of morals, religion or politics. The mails should be free and equal and inviolable to all, and no postal officer should have any right to exclude any paper or letter from the Post-office upon his judgment of the meaning of the contents. The Comstock Postal Laws should be repealed or modified accordingly.

III.—The people at large should be plainly told that this subject is one that involves the fundamental question of their liberty.

1. They should be admonished to enforce their own laws, and never to permit any religious coterie to acquire a monopoly of such enforcement.

2. All laws by which postal officials (whether instigated by this society or not) can exclude any particular newspaper from the mails on account of its meaning, wholly, or practically by refusing the usual rates of postage allowed to other papers, should be repealed at once.

This exclusion has just been effected under the United States Comstock laws as to three papers in this city and one in Boston upon the discretion of the postal officials. Any law that leaves a discretion to an official makes him a censor.

The making of such laws means the end of the freedom of the press, and consequently the end of freedom of thought and speech.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

An Infidel Abroad.

For at least a century it has been customary for clergymen to visit Europe, but seldom, if ever, has a professed Infidel visited the old world and, still better, told what he saw. But in the above decidedly interesting volume, Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, tells of his experience in a trip to Europe. To giv any idea of the spice, interest, and attractiv character of his work is impossible, but it is a change from other books of travel, and saint or sinner can enjoy its perusal. It is a fine 12mo volume of 850 pages (containing enough for two common volumes), is elegantly bound, and still is sold for only $1.50. Mr. Bennett visited London, Paris, Venice, Pompeii, Rome, and indeed all the places worth seeing, and he tells what he saw in a most entertaining manner. Readers of the Banner will make a good investment if they buy this book, which may be received prepaid from D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York, or from this office.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1881.

That Long Journey.

I hav decided to make it. After giving the subject full consideration for several months, weighing the pros and cons as best I could, giving those in favor of it and those opposed to it due attention, I hav made up my mind to make the circuit of the globe.

When the proposition was first made by friend D. C. Coleman, of California, I had not thought of such an undertaking, but readily made a promis that I would go if enough of my friends feeling the same way would advance the necessary means to make the journey. The proposition was that every person who advanced five dollars should receive a volume of my description of what I might see while "swinging round the circle." I said that if three hundred would accept this offer I would go. Three hundred hav accepted it; four hundred hav accepted it; and it will be seen on another page that the fifth hundred is pretty well along. So, to keep my word, I shall hav to go.

I wished to place myself in the hands of my friends, and in this matter to do that which is most agreeable to the greatest number of them. A pretty free expression of opinion has been given, and as the vote stands, fully twenty are in favor of my going where one is opposed to it. This virtually decides the question, and I hav little choice in the matter save to put my house in order and to make ready for the journey.

I hav felt highly complimented in the value which friends place upon my efforts to please and interest them, and proud that I hav so many friends who giv solid proofs of their confidence and esteem. I hav felt as highly complimented by those who are opposed to my going and refuse to advance a dollar to help me perform the journey, as by those who are in favor of my going. But I fear both classes place too high a value upon my feeble efforts. Whether, however, on this side of the globe or the other, I shall endeavor to perform my duty to the best of my ability.

When I am asked what my choice is in the matter I hardly know what to say. Of course there is pleasure in the thought of viewing the parts of the world which I hav read about so many years. There is something agreeable in the thought of visiting Athens, Constantinople, Alexandria, Cairo, the pyramids, the ancient Egyptian temples, the long, narrow hill country, the Red Sea and Mount Sinai, the little seven-by-nine country where God and his people used to dwell; Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Jericho, the river Jordan, Hebron, Dan, Beersheba, Mount Moriah, Bethel, Nazareth, Capernaum, the sea of Galilee, and all the rest of those places of ancient renown. There is something pleasant, even, in the thought of journeying to Lebanon and Damascus on a mule or donkey, but more in steaming from Suez to Bombay, thence to Benares by rail, and all over India, visiting the holy cities, ancient rock temples, the sites of olden legends and myths; to visit Calcutta, Ceylon, Burmah, Siam, China, and Japan, and exploring those countries so far as time and means will allow. But all these are not so much to me as THE TRUTH SEEKER and my TRUTH SEEKER friends. I take more pleasure in communing with them weekly than even in the anticipation of visiting the places named. I hav often thought that sitting here by my table in my little TRUTH SEEKER office, doing my best to show my fellow-beings what I believe to be truth and right, is the happiest place in all the world to me.

So I do not go abroad altogether for pleasure. I go, in part, because I conceive it will afford an opportunity to add somewhat to the little I hav already accomplished, and contribute to the amusement and instruction of my friends and readers. Of course I hav often thought I would like to make a journey round the world, and accumulating years admonish me that if I do make that journey it must not be deferred to very far in the future. The present is at my command, but I know little about what may come later on.

This journey, then, will not be one of pleasure only. It will be arduous, toilsome, and I will need to spend every spare moment in writing up what I see and meet with. And there is almost a dread in plodding alone over so many distant and strange countries, where I know not the people nor their language, whose habits are strange to one, whom I cannot understand, and with difficulty can make understand me. But it will not be so bad as lying in a prison cell, and perhaps may make some amends for the dreary months passed within those walls.

Some of the objections that hav been raised should perhaps be noticed: 1. My absence for eight or ten months will not need to lead to the failure of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It will be as ably conducted as heretofore, and be as worthy of the support of the Liberals of the country. My faithful little wife will preside in the office, and Eugene Macdonald will attend to the editorial department as ably as on previous occasions, and numerous friends will contribute to these columns with earnest ability. I shall probably be no longer absent than when in prison, and I trust my weekly letters will make full amends for what I might say if at home. The success of THE TRUTH SEEKER depends largely upon its patrons. If they are not too derelict in sending in the munitions of war, the means to meet its constant and heavy expenses, prosperity will attend the paper. The warfare of truth, the testimony against error and superstition, will not be slackened.

2. It has been proposed that instead of traveling in foreign countries I travel in our own country and visit friends in its various parts. All this can be done a little later on. My absence will be but a few months, and when I return I will be happy to visit places and friends in various sections of the country and tell them what I hav seen, my opinions of the past, and my hopes for the future.

3. Some fear I am too far advanced in life to make such a long journey, and alone. I entertain no fears on this ground. I am rather young for my age, and deem my health and strength sufficient to enable me to travel around the planet. True, I would be very glad of company and indulge the hope that some Liberal who has the time and means may conclude to accompany me. I will rejoice if such may be the case

4. There is a somewhat widespread apprehension that this is to be an unfortunate year on account of the position and influence of the planets. But I entertain no fears on that ground. The planets can hardly exercise any more baneful influence on the other side of the globe than on this. Sickness and contagions are just as likely to visit this section of the globe as any other. In fact the death rate right here in New York seems to be greater than that in almost any other part of the world.

5. It is feared by some that some accident or mishap may befall me, that I will never return, but this fear seems unfounded. Traveling is not particularly dangerous. People in the oriental countries are well-disposed; I hav no enemies there, while I hav bitter enemies here, and undoubtedly more to fear from enmity and malice than in any other part of the world. In fact, a journey abroad may be the very thing to prevent some vile attack being made upon me, though that is no reason for my going. I hope to hold myself prepared for whatever may come, and should it be my fate to meet death on the opposit side of the globe, I presume my bones will rest as quietly there as here, and that I will make just as bright an angel from one hemisphere as the other.

6. It has been thought by several that Mrs. B. ought to accompany me. In many respects this would be very agreeable to both of us, but the journey is too long and arduous for her. We cannot both be away at the same time; besides, the money is not forthcoming to take both of us. It would far more than double the expenses for her to go, as it would be impossible and improper for her to "rough it" as I can, and expect to. If money enough is furnished to send me all the way around, and meet all expenses, it is as much as I can expect. In fact I found that my first estimate of the expenses of the journey was far too low. I learn that traveling in the far East is much more expensiv than in Europe; that in many cases I shall require an escort and private conveyance, which will entail much more expense than public routes of travel. India, Persia, Burmah, China, and Japan are pretty extensiv countries to travel over, and to do so pretty heavy expenses are inevitable. It would seem, too, that if time and expenses are incurred to go so far, a pretty thorough examination of the countries should be made, and as many of the sights and curiosities seen as possible.

When shall I go? This depends on the friends who hav pledged to send me five dollars each to help me make the journey. I shall be ready to start soon after receiving the sums so kindly promised. I now respectfully suggest that those who hav agreed to aid me to make this journey remit the amounts so pledged. For every five dollars sent me for this purpose I will forward a set of the books I propose to write while absent. There will not be less than two volumes; perhaps three. I shall endeavor to make them interesting, instructiv, and worth the money advanced. One or two of them will be issued before my return, and will be forwarded to the donors who make the advances.

It is my purpose to visit some countries and places in Europe which I did not visit last year, to attend the Freethinkers' Congress to be held at Paris this season, and then to commence circling the earth in earnest.

The journey will necessarily cost a good deal of money; the expense of bringing out the books will be no small sum, and it will cost considerable to hire my share of the business here at home to be performed by others. With these points in view, more pledges and more remittances of five dollars each will be very acceptable. If those who hav not subscribed to this fund will still do so, or if those who hav pledged for a share will induce others to join them, the same will be gladly received. I expect to make nothing by the enterprise, but hope not to be left too much out of pocket. I trust that those who advance the money will find the books in return satisfactory. The more of these that can be disposed of the better.

The list of donors' names will be published occasionally in these columns, and as the pledges are sent in they will be duly acknowledged. I hope it will be convenient for friends to be tolerably prompt. D. M. B.

Many thanks to all these friends. We are able to announce that competent mechanics are now at work repairing the monument, and in two weeks or thereabouts the work will be accomplished. The wall of the inclosure will be repaired, the grounds will be improved, and, if the money holds out, an iron front fence and iron gate with stone posts will be put up. There is probably about money enough received to complete all these improvements.

On May 30th (Decoration day) the friends will gather at the monument, which will be decorated and rededicated. A company will go out from this city, several little speeches will be made, and it is hoped an enjoyable time will be had. Capt. George W. Loyd will act as marshal on the occasion, and a picnic dinner will be served up on the ground. Friends and the public are invited.

Col. Ingersoll's New Lecture

Entitled "The Great Infidels" was delivered on last Sunday evening at the Academy of Music, probably the largest theater in this city. Nearly every seat was filled and many were compelled to stand for the more than two hours occupied by the lecturer. Probably no less than 3,000 persons were in attendance. The lecture was a masterly effort, welling up with the choicest and most brilliant gems of rhetoric, sentiment, humor, and earnest truth that a lecture ever contained. The audience seemed almost spell-bound and were perfectly in rapport with the speaker.

A summary of the lecture will be deferred till next week as the space is more than engaged for this issue. Suffice it to say the Colonel paid a glowing tribute to the great Infidels of the world, Emperor Julian, Spinoza, Diderot, Voltaire, Hume, Franklin, Paine, and Jefferson. He considered them the bright, particular stars which had led us from darkness into light, and who had performed most valuable services to mankind. The lecture was interspersed with humor, which repeatedly elicited the most hearty and lively applause, and was a grand success indeed.

Czarism in America.

It has been a long time since an act has been committed which has more justly enraged the Liberal mind than the late tyrannical orders of the post-office department relativ to the suppression of the Physiologist, Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, and the Agents' Advocate. It is quite enough to fill every honest heart with indignation to witness such tyranny in what is called Free America. Often is the inquiry made, "Where do our public servants get the authority to crush any publication and any publisher they please?" They get it only by an unwarranted exercise of the power placed in their hands. The whole business is totally unamerican and befitting the tyrants of Europe more than our own free land.

Many letters of sympathy hav been sent in by various parties expressive of the indignation which these acts of despotism engender. The following from Elizur Wright to Mrs. Dr. Chase may be taken as a sample:

BOSTON, MASS., April 25, 1881.

SARA B. CHASE, M.D.: The arbitrary and shameless exclusion of your Physiologist from the mails ought to arouse the indignation of every rational and decent man and woman in America. I think it will. If I were a postmaster, either the highest or the lowest, there are some species of reptil literature which I would not knowingly allow to go through—law or no law. I would burn them or throw them into some proper receptacle of filth, and take the consequences.

I suppose the officer who ukased your Physiologist out of the mails expects to take the consequences, but I think they will be more disastrous to him than he expects.

It cannot be that bigotry and superstition can run this government by the agency of a reptil fished up out of the slums.

You hav, it seems to me, a good case, and as soon as it is known the Liberal people will rally around you and we shall soon know by judicial authority whether the mails belong to the people or to a conglomeration of fanatics who claim the right to place in every family a book containing much falsehood and some filth.

I believe you hav nobly done your duty, and I hope you are not to be a martyr to it. Were it my last crumb I would do something to prevent that. Yours truly,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

It is cheering that offers of material aid are made, and that there is a strong desire entertained by many to wage a conflict with the power so ruthlessly crushing the just rights of individuals. The following may be taken as a very generous sample. It is from Wm. C. Wilson, the proprietor of the Wilsonia magnetic garments.

BROOKLYN, May 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I herewith hand you my check for one hundred dollars to be added to the Chase fund. I wish it used to help defend her rights which hav been wrested from her by the tyrants in power. If any portion of the money is not needed for that purpose I wish it devoted to the benefit of the Physiologist. Yours truly,

WM. C. WILSON.

If other generous souls wish to aid in the defense of these cases they may do so by remitting to the editor of this paper or to Hugh B. Brown, 141 Eighth street, the Treasurer of the National Defense Association.

Our Boston friends are up in arms at this official outrage that has been committed. The Globe of last Sunday had over a column, giving a full and sensible history of the outrage. By the following communication it will be seen that an indignation meeting is to be held in Paine Hall, on which occasion this species of despotism will be appropriately denounced.

Indignation Meeting.—Rights of the Free Press again Outraged.

In Paine Hall, Boston, May 15th, a meeting of the people will be held to defend the liberty of the press, and to expose to the scorn of all lovers of freedom the usurpation of the rights of American citizens, the censorship of the free press, in the recent ukase from Washington excluding from the United States mails the Physiologist. And as if this blunder and outrage were not enough, Comstockism through the First Assistant Postmaster-General has issued the pronunciamento that no future number of the Physiologist shall be permitted to go through the mails! What does all this mean, if it be not "Czarism taking root in American soil?" Besides excluding the Physiologist from the mails, the same authority has prohibited the circulation through the mails of Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, and the Agents' Advocate, unless under penalty of being rated as third-class mail matter, which is virtually the extinguishment of these papers. These journals are obnoxious to Comstock and he is attempting to crush them, while other papers of like general character, but which hav not dared to lisp a word against this mountebank, are allowed to circulate through the mails as second-class mail matter.

The following able speakers are invited to be present at the meeting and giv tongue to these gigantic wrongs: Hon. Elizur Wright, Horace Seaver, T. B. Wakeman, D. M. Bennett, George Chainey, Dr. Sara B. Chase, E. H. Heywood, J. W. Stillman, Dr. Kinget, Dr. E. B. Foote, J. M. L. Babcock.

The American Labor Reform League.

Its twelfth annual Convention met in Science Hall, New York, Sunday and Monday, May 1st and 2d, day and evening. The Monday forenoon session, as usual, was devoted to the American Anti-Usury Society. J. K. Ingalls, R. W. Hume, E. H. Heywood, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. Hanson, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, Dr. C. S. Weeks, H. B. Brown, Minnie Merton, Dr. E. P. Miller, Dr. B. M. Lawrence, John B. Wolff, Louis Masquerier, Edward Palmer, Wm. Schneider, Messrs. Forbush, Charbone, and others spoke.

J. K. Ingalls was reëlected President of the Anti-Usury Society, and R. W. Hume, Secretary. The old board of officers of the American Labor Reform League were reëlected. Wm. Rowe, President; Wm. Hanson and E. H. Heywood, Secretaries.

From the resolutions presented by Mr. Heywood we giv the following:

Resolved, That as "pay no interest, rent, or other dishonest profit" becomes the inspiration of productiv enterprise, citizens should know that rent thieves, usurers, and other profit takers, like their predecessors, the slave-holders, exist only because so-called law sanctions their invasiv claims, government enabling them to hold their lucrativ victims, working people, in tribute-paying vassalage.

Resolved, That, as Beaconsfield celebrated regicidal resistance to tyranny, we see in the Nihilists who translated Alexander II., as in secession effort to remove Abraham Lincoln, the rebound of invasiv blows struck at home rule and personal liberty; that if Bismarck and Gladstone also meet their Brutus, and heads of repressiv robbery here are taken off, labor thereby asserting its belligerent right of self-defense against the insatiable piracies of capital, now, as of old, the cause of oppressed millions, thus vindicated, may become the cause of human nature.

Resolved, That as Parnell & Co. conspire with Gladstone to sacrifice labor to capital in Ireland, Greenback flatists here, ignorant of equity, hostil to liberty, seek a more equal distribution of power to plunder service: that whatever cunning politicians and purblind priests say to the contrary, hands able to improve land should hold it against all comers, debts paid once in the form of interest are paid forever, and buildings which hav paid the cost in rent rightfully belong to resident tenants for use without robbery.

Resolved, That the exclusion of the Irish World from English mails and censorship of the press exercised here by Comstock, Blaine & Co., prohibiting Mrs. Chase's Physiologist, fining Dr. Foote's Health Monthly without law and against law, like the futil efforts of government to suppress "Fruits of Philosophy," "Cupid's Yokes," and "Words in Pearl," show the cowardice and imbecility of statesmen in conflict with personal wit; that this outrage on America, cosmopolitan citizenship, resented by intelligent people the world over, will quicken effort to sustain the journals assailed, hasten liberation of Ireland and the triumph of social freedom.

Obituary.

Died, at Hannibal, Oswego Co., N. Y., March 3, 1881, Lovina D. Titus, wife of N. Titus.

She was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a full believer in the principles it advocates. She was trained under strict Baptist faith, and lived a consistent member of said church until she stopped to think for herself, instead of allowing the bigoted priests to think for her—then of course she must see things differently. For I say that any persons who will do their own thinking will not believe in an endless hell nor in the vicarious atonement, for the doctrin is too absurd for any thinking person to believe in. The deceased did not expect to be saved through Christ or any other savior, but believed she must work out her own salvation. She retained her reason till the last and had no fear of death.

N. TITUS.

More League Members.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since my last communication the following persons hav become annual members of the Iowa Liberal League: C. P. Hosmer, Belle Plaine; Al. D. Leech, Donnellson; J. U. Schelling, Manchester; Dr. John Brown, Bismarck.

Let theirs be but the first drops of the continuous rain of ducats which shall pour into the State League treasury; may they be but the avant-coureurs of the great army of freemen who shall enlist under the banner of secularism. Annual membership, fifty cents; life, $5.00. Who next?

Will the hundreds of Iowa Liberals to whom I hav written and who hav not answered, please do so at once?

The increase in the number of auxiliary Leagues and of the membership of the National League is very gratifying and is a fit commentary upon the growlings of one or two obscure pseudo Liberal sheets, which are still all in a flutter over the manly and womanly action of the Chicago Congress. Does any man with a grain of common sense in his head or a spark of humanity in his heart believe that the French professor mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 2d deserves the torture he is now undergoing? Let us proclaim a whole faith though the heavens of injustice fall. Rejoiced am I that our noble TRUTH SEEKER keeps a vigilant eye upon Inquisitor Comstock. We do not realize how closely we tread the brink of a volcano. An eruption may occur any hour. Bro. Lynn is right, you are needed here. Fraternally, E. C. WALKER.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Eleventh Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A professorship in the London University or any other scholarly position is not a guarantee that the possessors are proof against vagaries. There is really no necessity for your complaining attacks on my method of dealing with your authorities. I am not so uncritical or illiberal as to estimate men like Prof. Newman, Mr. Greg, and others from whom you have at various times made quotations, as weak men or of unsound mind, but on the contrary accord to them the full meed of no ordinary scholarship. But scholars do have vagaries, and much of the scholarship of to-day may be the nonsense of to-morrow. Thus in his time Sir William Jones was an unrivaled scholar, an authority whose dictum was absolutely law in the interpretation of Hindoo mythology and all matters of Aryan civilization. Yet how puerile and utterly fallacious many of his theories were! What an overthrow of all previous scholarship the discovery of the Rosetta stone was destined to produce. The ponderous tomes, the learned theories that had been the elaborate productions of men of world-wide reputation for scholarship, were proved to be "baseless as the fabric of a dream." For two thousand years it was believed that of two bodies falling, one weighing five pounds, the other one, the former would fall five times as rapidly as the latter. Aristotle had taught this, and, as he was authority, it became all scholarship and education to receive the dictum. Yet what a vagary it was! So that, while acknowledging the scholarship and learning of Prof. Newman, I am not bound to receive all he teaches, and when I remember that scholars as able and learned at least as he differ from him and present what to me has more weight, being positive facts, than any theories, I can very unceremoniously, as far as I am concerned, consign them to the limbo of untenable vagaries.

Let me here say, also, what, if I had thought, I would have premised in the commencement of this debate, that in using the terms Infidelity, Infidel, etc., I use the words merely to avoid circumlocution, and not as any reproach. I had supposed, however, you understood this.

I think I am unfortunate in that I have so much to read that is entirely irrelevant and so much repetition. It seems somewhat discourteous, too, to pass it by unnoticed, and it affords an opportunity for such endless reiteration that I know not but the unwary reader may imagine there is some weight in it. Thus in your letter under review there is the repetition of the remarks of Prof. Robertson Smith, a man who owes all his notoriety to his eccentricities of scholarship, that "we do not possess any historical notice of the existence of the original copies of the New Testament writings." From the almost universal destruction of the early Christian writings an objection like this is quite safely made, and often gathers to itself great force. But as I have before answered to this, while the disingenuousness of the objection will not be unperceived, it loses all its force from the fact that Tertullian bears positive testimony that any one going to the respective churches to which they were addressed could see the autograph letters of the apostles themselves in his time.

You taunt me with not noticing the rather remarkable grapes and wheat which you say Irenæus described. If Irenæus did write such tales it in no way affects the reliability of the quotation I made from him. I did not notice them for this reason and also because you do not give any reference to chapter or page whereby I may test it. There are translations of Irenæus in the Astor Library; will you be kind enough to designate the page and chapter where I may see it for myself? It is of very little importance, however.

"It has been asked," you say, "why were four gospels necessary?" Of course, if the Bible is the word of God, as the universe is his work, this question would be on a par with an inquiry as to why Jupiter has four satellites or Saturn three rings. You continue, "If God wished a gospel written giving the facts of his son's visit to the earth and his ignominious death, why should the story be told more than once?" Simply, that God wished to, and those who have studied it most see daily more and more wisdom in it. "One multiplication table" you say, "has proved sufficient, four multiplication tables have been entirely unnecessary." Since you are given to quibbles, let me tell you that I hav seen two multiplication tables, one from 1 to 12, another from 1 to 20. You will admit, however, that your whole paragraph is a waste of space, for the reason why there are four gospels have no connection with a thesis as to their authorship. However, since you have asked the question I will give you a reason that answers it to my satisfaction, and also show the correctness of that analogy for pointing out which Irenæus has suffered so unmercifully at your hands. In the first chapter of Ezekiel the prophet describes a vision of the four cherubims, a verse of which reads, "They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion on the right side and they four had the face of an ox on the left side, they four also had the face of an eagle" (Ezek. i, 10). This description Irenæus considered typical of the four gospel-portraits of Christ. The first, he thought signified Matthews' gospel, the second John's, the third Luke's, and the fourth Mark's. But hear his words: "The cherubim too were four faced and their faces were images of the dispensation of the son of God. For as the scripture says, 'The first living creature was like a lion,' symbolizing his effectual working, his leadership and royal power; the second was like a calf, signifying his sacrificial and sacerdotal order; but 'the third had as it were the face of a man,' an evident description of his advent as a human being; 'the fourth was like a flying eagle,' pointing out the gift of the spirit hovering with his wings over the church, and therefore the gospels are in accord with these things, among which Jesus Christ is seated. For that according to John relates his original, effectual, and glorious generation from the Father. . . . But that according to Luke, taking up his priestly character, commenced with Zacharias the priest offering sacrifice to God. . . . Matthew again relates his generation as a man. . . . This, then, is the gospel of his humanity. . . . Mark, on the other hand, commences with a reference to the prophetic spirit coming down from on high to men, . . . pointing to the winged aspect of the gospel."

The quotations may be too mystical, but there is certainly no proof from them that the man was a hypocrite or a fool, as you so harshly contend.

Allow me, however, to make a quotation from a Christian writer who presents the truth in a manner that seems to me more exact:

"The gospel of Matthew sets Christ before us in the character of the son of David and of Abraham, that is to say, in connection with the promises made to Israel, but presents him withal as Emanuel, Jehovah the Savior, for such Christ was. It is he who, being received, should have accomplished the promises (and hereafter he will do so) in favor of this beloved people. This gospel is in fact the history of his rejection by the people, and consequently that of the condemnation of the people themselves, so far as their responsibility was concerned (for the counsels of God cannot fail), and the substitution of that which God was going to bring in according to his purpose. . . . The object of the spirit of God in this gospel being to present Jehovah as fulfilling the promises made to Israel, and the prophecies that relate to the Messiah (and no one can but be struck with the number of references to their fulfillment), he commences with the genealogy of the Lord, starting from David and Abraham, the two stocks from which the Messianic genealogy sprang, and to which the promises had been made. . . .

"The gospel according to Mark has a character that differs in certain respects from all the others. Each gospel has its own character; each is occupied with the person of the Lord in a different point of view—as a divine person, the son of God, as the Son of Man, as the son of David, the Messiah presented to the Jews. But Mark is occupied with none of these titles. It is the servant we find here; and in particular his service as bearing the word; the active service of Christ in the gospel. The glory of his divine person shows itself, it is true, in a remarkable manner through his service, and, as it were, in spite of himself, so that he avoids its consequences. But still service is the subject of the book. . . . On this account the history of his birth is not found in Mark. It opens with the announcement of the beginning of the gospel."

(I might here remark, as has been remarked by others, that the word immediately—servant language—occurs in the New Testament about eighty times, and half of this number of times it occurs in this gospel. I speak of the Greek; our translators have sometimes rendered it "forthwith" in our version.)

"The gospel of Luke sets the Lord before us in the character of Son of Man, revealing God in delivering grace among men. . . . In Luke, we add, that which especially characterizes the narrative and gives its peculiar interest to this gospel is that it sets before us that which Christ is himself. It is not his official glory, a relative position that he assumed, neither is it the revelation of his divine nature in itself, nor his mission as the great prophet. It is himself, as he was, a man on the earth, the person whom I should have met every day had I lived at Judea or in Galilee. . . . .

"The gospel of John has a peculiar character, as every Christian perceives. It does not present the birth of Christ in this, looked at as the son of David. It does not trace his genealogy back to Adam in order to bring out his title of Son of Man. It does not exhibit the prophet who, by his testimony, accomplished the service of his Father in this respect here below. It is neither his birth, nor the commencement of his gospel, but his existence before the beginning of everything that had a beginning. 'In the beginning was the Word.' In short, it is the glory of the person of Jesus, the Son of God, above all dispensation—a glory developed in many ways in grace, but which is always itself. It is that which he is, but making us share in all the blessings that flow from it, when he is so manifested as to impart them."

I have copied an attempt to present in a few words a sketch of the peculiar glories of the gospels and the distinctive purpose for which each was written. I think it answers your question, and, moreover, shows the wisdom of the Divine Inspirer of the evangelical records in dictating four different and yet harmonious views of that wonderful man—the meek, gentle, ill-treated wayfarer of the villages of Judea and Galilee, who was also the co-equal Son of the eternal God.

You ask why Paul did not make "any mention of Jesus being taken bodily up into heaven. And if he did not say anything about that or Christ's wonderful miracles, will you please tell us why he did not?" And as a sort of leading reply to your own question, you conclude the paragraph interrogatively, "Was it not probably because the story of those things had not then been written, and because Irenæus & Co. had not yet discovered the four canonical gospels?" In dismissing your latter question as a non sequitur, I might argue, if your logic is conclusive, that Matthew and John were written before Mark and Luke because they give no description of the ascension of Christ whatever.

Paul did believe in the bodily ascension of Jesus Christ, and had undoubtedly seen the four gospels. What did he refer to in such scriptures as "Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures, and that he was buried and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures?" (1 Cor. xv, 3, 4). What scriptures does Paul refer to? What manner of resurrection and ascension was it that Paul had in mind when he wrote "according to the working of his (God's) mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places . . . and hath put all things under his feet?" (Eph. i, 20–22), saying in the same epistle, as quoted in my last letter, "He (Christ) that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens" (lv, 10). Can it be possible that you really believe Paul did not mean a bodily ascension? Is it an unembodied spirit, then, that Paul teaches "shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God," and whom "we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together to meet?" Is the ascended Christ an unembodied spirit, of whom this same Paul says, "In him dwelleth the fulness of the godhead bodily" (Col. ii, 9)—this ascended Christ "who sitteth on the right hand of God?" (Col. iii, 1). Again, does he refer to an unembodied spirit when he says of Christians, in a verse most sadly neglected in the churches to-day, "our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like to his glorious body?" (Phil. iii, 20, 21). Again I invite your attention to the ascension scenes of the gospels. Mark says, "He was received up into heaven and sat on the right hand of God" (xvi, 19). Luke relates, "While he blessed them he was parted from them and carried up in heaven" (xxiv, 51). Paul writes to the Ephesians, as just quoted, God "raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand" (i, 20), word for word, almost identical; does one mean a bodily and one a spiritual (whatever that may be) ascension? Let me ask you to seriously consider these scriptures and tell me if you are not convinced that, whether true or false, the apostle Paul believed in a bodily resurrection and a bodily ascension.

In the same manner it can be proved that Paul believed in the incarnation of Christ, in his miraculous conception, etc. But you will refer me again to the miracles of Christ and ask why Paul does not enumerate them. I reply that after the ascension of Christ, the Holy Spirit was sent down as on the day of Pentecost to dwell in the church which was then formed for the first time. Peter for the last time offered that if the Jews should repent Christ would return and the millennial glory of the Old Testament prophecies commence. The Jews rejected the offer, the authorities imprisoning Peter. After this Paul is converted, and unto him a special ministry is assigned and a revelation is made that was entirely new. This was his life work. Christ had sent the other apostles with a commission to baptize. Paul could say, "Christ sent me not to baptize" (1 Cor. i, 17), but to preach what he called "my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest" (Rom. xvi, 25), describing his commission in other places as one specially committed to him.

The special mystery which Paul was used to teach had no existence at the time of Christ's life on earth. It was that all believers from the day of Pentecost until the second coming of Christ are baptized by the Spirit of God into one body, of which Christ is the head. Such believers are by their dispensational position heavenly men, with heavenly hopes; alas! that they are not so practically! Even we know not Christ after the flesh. A Christ in glory coming to redeem his bride, this should be the hope of Christians. Hence, how foreign to the epistles of Paul to refer to Christ's miracles performed while on earth. The gospels are written with an entirely different view; they are transcripts of the life and teachings of Christ while he was on earth. Paul's epistles are doctrinal teachings of truths not even hinted at by Christ while on earth, but hid from the beginning of the world until revealed unto Paul. One expecting to find references to Christ's miracles in the Pauline epistles might as consistently peruse an astronomical work to find a practical manual on gardening. The latter would exhibit as intelligent a conception of the field of astronomy as to expect the miracles in the Pauline letters.

In common with the general views of Infidelity, you nourish the idea that if there be a God he is one who to be merciful must entirely overlook sin. If the apostle had asked you, "Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance?" you would have replied in the affirmative and denied that God could judge the world. Your idea of God would be a being full of sentimental pity but without any attributes of holiness or justice. Pursuing this line of argument, you ask: "Was it loving and merciful in him to order fifty thousand women put to death in cold blood and as many little male infants, and that the female infants, little girls, and youthful virgins who had never lain with man be kept alive for the use of his soldiers and priests? You cannot deny that being in the Bible." But I do deny it. Produce the chapter and verse.

Further on you continue, "Was it love and mercy that prompted him to command that whole nations of his own offspring should be exterminated by the sword, that women should be ripped up, and little innocent children put to death?" I reply, when I read the reason of it, Yes. If your argument was impartial you would quote the reason as well as the fact. The nations who were thus summarily dealt with were diseased through and through with abominable crimes, which were too coarse even to mention. In the expressiv language of scripture, the reason is given, "The land is defiled; therefore do I visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomited out its inhabitants" (Lev. xviii, 25); and the impartial warning to the Hebrews was, "Ye shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you (for all these abominations have the men of the land done which were before you, and the land is defiled), that the land spew not you out also, when ye defile it; as it spewed out the nations that were before you." Infidelity may indeed become the champion of such moral lepers, but certainly it will be little to its credit in the judgment of all clean-hearted men.

And in all the other objections you adduce in the same connection the argument for Infidelity appears in the same unenviable light. To be sure the facts are colored and distorted, as any one familiar with the scripture would immediately recognize, but overlooking this, the Biblical reasons given for each command refute all cavils. I do not think them worthy of any extended examination; the greater part are stated with a coarseness of language with which I should hav given you credit for too much self-respect to suppose you would insult the readers of your paper by printing it. If you revel in such foul imaginations you do not find the details in the Bible with which to color them. It is, however, curious to observe how, while distorting and caricaturing every passage on which you deem you can found a harsh statement, you entirely overlook such teachings from the very heart of the same books, as:

"Thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and the stranger."

"Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another."

"Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbor, neither rob him; the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning. Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block before the blind."

"Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honor the person of the mighty, but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor. Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people, neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbor."

"Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart: thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbor and not suffer sin upon him. Thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

"Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head and fear thy God."

"And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself."

"Thou shalt not revile the magistrates nor curse the ruler of thy people."

"Thou shalt not raise a false report. Put not thy hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness. Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil, neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment."

"If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou seest the ass of him that hateth thee, lying under his burden, and wouldst forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help him."

"If thy brother, a Hebrew man or a Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee and serve thee six years, then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out from thee free, thou shalt not let him go away empty; thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock and out of thy floor and out of thy wine-press; of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him."

"Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates."

"The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers. Every man shall be put to death for his own sin."

Read the books of Moses which you so coarsely caricature, and you will not be so illiberal. It is comparatively easy to wrench a text from its context and distort its meaning, but the real truth seeker will have no sympathy with such a course.

It is a hopeless task, seemingly, to correct the flippant errors of your manner of stating facts and doctrines. God does not "demand the blood of his own beloved son in order that he might be brought into a mild, forgiving humor." It was his own love devised the plan of human redemption and it is the only way in which a just and holy God can forgive a sinner.

Yes, you teach the true gospel when you say, "Blood, blood, blood, runs all through the Bible," although thousands of so-called Christians disbelieve it. Mr. Pentecost and Mr. Moody, as you quote them, both state eternal truths—it is the blood of Jesus Christ alone that brings salvation, sanctification, and glory. Millions have experienced the truth of this. You, of course, do not believe it, still that does not alter its truth. But can you not see sin and its sad results? Are you not a mystery to yourself? Is not life an enigma to you? Science cannot unravel it, philosophy cannot solve it; the scriptures alone make it plain. Why will you not believe?

Yours truly, G. M. Mair.

Gentlemanly Treatment.

The following letter written to Col. Ingersoll from England by a gentleman who has published there his lecture "What Must We Do to be Saved?" shows very plainly the difference between one who appreciates an author's rights and those who do not:

Dear Sir: You will hav seen by the Secular Review and by the copies of the "Reprint" mailed to you that a few of us hav availed ourselvs of the license given us by the absence of international copyright to issue in this country your admirable lecture, "What Must We Do to be Saved?"

I had purposed writing you before we did it to obtain your authorization, but an intervening illness of mine drove us so near the date on which we had determined to publish as not to leave time for communicating with you, hence the omission of that duty. And as at the outset we quite looked for a pecuniary loss to ourselvs from the undertaking, our shortcoming did not appear to us very serious.

However, the sale having been got up so far in advance of our expectation, a profit has resulted instead of a loss. The ultimate amount of this profit we propose to remit in toto to you, as a substantial apology for our offense. I inclose post-office order for the first instalment (£2, 10s., 0d.,—12 dollars), and as soon as we are in a position to strike a final balance will communicate with you again.

We are now printing a large (3d) edition, of which we hope to dispose. As a rule advertising is expensiv, and in these cases very uncertain. But I am pleased to report that a gentleman in London, who is delighted with the lecture and our get-up of it, has generously placed at my disposal a sum of £14, 12s., 6d (about 70 dollars), to be used for printing and posting all London with 3,000 placards (I send copies) fully advertising the book. (We are also ourselvs doing some hundreds for the provinces). We are perfect strangers to each other. He says, "I shall not be disappointed if the apparent result of my outlay is very small. I sow the seed in 'faith,' and do not require immediate visible fruit."

Should you think proper to recognize his liberality by mailing him any of your writings, I giv you his address, A. Vacher, Esq., 12 Fitzroy st., London, W.

We hope to hav a line from you by an early mail, granting us indulgence for the latitude we hav permitted ourselvs in the publication.

If you can heartily absolve us, we would like to know on what conditions we may issue, uniform with "What Must We Do?" the "Some Mistakes of Moses," in our series of Bijou Reprints. I hav only seen an Australian mutilated edition, and should wish to hav the true original for reproduction. Also could you let us hav a good engraved (steel or wood) portrait of yourself? This we would hav reproduced as a zincograph to print with type and form frontispiece.

I am a young architect with a mania for popularizing beauty of form, as it is to my taste; hence the peculiar get-up of the "Reprint," your opinion on which I am anxious to hav. I hav another hobby for rationalistic propaganda, to which I devote perhaps more attention than my merely temporal interests would justify; however, it is my happiness.

Whatever pecuniary profit we reap for you will, I think, be insignificant as against preparing the way for your talked-of visit to England, which I hope may soon come about and successfully.

W. Larner Sugden.

Notes.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker, Sir: At this date I am at the residence of H. H. Chase, in Union City. Mr. Chase is an old-time patron of The Truth Seeker, and he holds out a steady and intelligent hand in behalf of the principles of universal freedom and human rights as they were bequeathed to us by the fathers of this republic.

The residence of Mr. Chase and his estimable family is situated upon a high bluff overlooking the valley of the St. Joseph and the Coldwater rivers, just at a point where these two rivers unite. The town takes its name from the union of these two rivers at this point. And the view from this high bluff upon the valley below, and in the distance beyond, is picturesque and romantic indeed.

Union City has taken the palm thus far with me in its patronage of The Truth Seeker. The town has only about fifteen hundred inhabitants, and there are about twenty subscribers to The Truth Seeker. This would seem to be sufficient to save the place and the people from the encroachment and demoralizing influence of superstition and sectarianism.

Some evangelists hav been here during the last winter, but hav made little or no impression. A man by the name of Davis, considerably noted as a revivalist, has been at the towns along the line of this air line branch of M. C. R. R. holding protracted meetings, but without success.

At Tekonsha, a small town ten miles east of Union City, Mr. Davis and his friends induced the people to close up their shops, stores, and places of business generally and to turn out en masse to hear Elder Davis preach, who opened his theological batteries at full blast for several nights; but the poor man failed entirely; he did not make a single convert, and could not succeed in saving one soul. When the people learn that they are not damned in the sense that orthodoxy would hav it, they will see that they are not in need of any such salvation as orthodoxy proffers, but rather that the salvation the world of mankind needs most is redemption from the power of the church and its emissaries.

When our ancestors fled from the old countries to the wilds of America, they came to these shores to find refuge from the intolerant and superstitious powers of the Christian church; and if the people are becoming sufficiently enlightened to be saved from the encroachments and the sophistries of these emissaries of religious darkness and superstition, then they are nearing that happier era when there will be a more universal humanity and fraternity among all the people.

I think there is no more permanent, reliable, and successful means of enlightening and elevating the people here than by a free and widespread circulation of Liberal and philosophical reading matter. This seems to be a quiet and effectual means of enlightening the people and of leading them on to a commendable development in individual sovereignty and personal freedom. And it is only under these conditions of individual growth and personal independence that we may hope to realize the grander benedictions of this republican form of government.

The unity of individual liberty, with the highest ideals of fraternal fellowship, and an honest and faithful desire for the good of the whole people, will ultimately work out for the American people a state of society in which there shall be no extremes of poverty or of riches, or of bigotry and sectarian strife.

Let the millions of money now squandered upon an aristocratic church and a sectarian ministry be converted into channels of industry and economy under the wiser direction of a comprehensiv charity and a far-reaching benevolence, and the ages of darkness will recede, giving place to the happier era of intelligence and an ever-increasing condition of human happiness.

Respectfully,

C. S. Rowley.

Christianity embraces in its universality the low comedy of colored Methodism, the melodrama of Congregationalism, the "Pinafore" religion of Episcopalianism, and the spectacular drama of Catholicism. Christianity is a chameleon; it takes the color of the ground on which it lies. In Europe it is aristocratic, and believes in the nobility; in America it is democratic and believes in a republican form of government. It upheld slavery as a divine institution and laid its hand in blessing upon the slave-holder, and only after Infidelity had freed the slaves did it see any sin in the evil system that made man the property of his fellow-man.—L. K. Washburn.

Discussion.

Our Twelfth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: The first thing I have to speak of will be "vagaries." You seem to think, and would be glad to make it appear, that those who are able to show up the false claims of Christianity and establish their falseness by the most irrefragable proofs, simply are troubled with "vagaries" and "eccentricities." Thus while you accord learning and scholarship to Greg, Newman, Davidson, Smith, and others, nevertheless, in so far as they said any thing damaging to Christian claims it was a vagary, an eccentricity. All we have in proof of this is your bare assertion; nothing else in the world. To find vagaries in the writings of such men as Greg and Newman requires an observer of your acuteness; ordinary minds are unable to see it. None have written more clearly than those men. They establish their positions by the most unanswerable proofs and arguments, going to the original documents and leaving nothing for the imagination. Still in your flippant but unfair style you fain would toss them aside as of no consequence. But if you cannot show where they are wrong, their proofs, their arguments and conclusions, must stand. The aspersion of "vagaries" does not touch them.

By the bye, since you speak so flippantly of vagaries on the part of those who do not bow down and worship your idol, it has occurred to me to inquire whether there are not a few vagaries on your side of the question; and I have come to the conclusion that Judaism and Christianity consist of and are built upon the most barefaced and absolute vagaries that the world has ever known. Let me recall but a few of them. At the foundation is the claim that about six thousand years ago a God said to possess infinite power, wisdom, and love created from nothing the thousands or millions of suns and worlds which constitute the universe; but he gave rather special attention to this small globe upon which we dwell. In fact, he caused all the vegetation of the earth to come to perfection, the grasses and leaves to grow, the flowers to bloom, and the fruits to ripen, before he took the trouble to create the sun for the benefit of this and other worlds. Near the close of six days of pretty hard work, after making fishes, reptiles, birds, and animals, he rolled up some mud and made a man, but discovering that he would be lonely and useless without a companion he gave him a powerful soporific and put him into a deep sleep, and by a surgical operation extracted one of the man's ribs, of which he formed a woman of such charming beauty that not only the man was attracted to her at once, but even a cunning big snake which God had made fondly approached her. The result was most disastrous to God, to the man and woman, and to countless millions of their offspring, even to the latest moments of eternity. The snake was the only one who made anything by that apple-eating speculation; he developed into a first-class devil and has been more than a match for his maker ever since.

This God of infinite power and wisdom being eternal had existed for millions, billions, trillions, quintillions, and decillions of ages multiplied together, cogitating, doubtless, upon what he should do to distinguish himself when he got ready to make a world and place people upon it. It seems a huge pity that after such long preparation, with such power and knowledge at his command, that he should have made such a complete failure, which he has never been able to correct. It was the greatest blunder ever conceived of, that a God of infinite power and love, after so protracted a period in which to mature his plans, should make an unsophisticated young man and woman who at the very first step they took should plunge into endless and irretrievable ruin and carry to eternal torture their vast and helpless progeny. A being with infinite power and knowledge who could do this is far worse than the basest devil the mind of man has ever conceived. It was a blunder, a crime of greater magnitude than all other crimes ever committed.

It is one of the Christian vagaries that this infinite, wise, and good God knew from all eternity just what the result of every act of his would be, and just how the beings he was about to create would plunge into eternal destruction. He made them liable to go astray and knew they inevitably would do evil, nevertheless he placed them where he knew they would utterly fall; and also created a tempter to lure them to their destruction with the full knowledge of what the result would be. You may adore such a God, but I cannot. I cannot believe that a being all-wise, powerful, and good would calmly prepare the conditions by which his creatures could possibly become utterly wretched. The great prevalence of want, suffering, destitution, unhappiness, misery, and evil of all kinds disproves the rule of a being all-powerful and all-good. If there is wretchedness in the world, whose fault is it save his who made the conditions? If wrong abounds, who is to blame for it save him who rendered it possible? If he wanted his creatures to be virtuous and happy, why did he not so create them that they would incline to virtuous deeds as water to run down hill? If he did not wish them to do wrong, why did he create a devil to entice them to evil? Why did he do anything to lead his children to unhappiness when he so well knew what the consequence of his measures must be long before he undertook them?

It does not detract from his criminality because there is another vagary that to make some amends for the lamentable blunder he had made he gave his dearly beloved son as a sacrifice or atonement for the sins which his creatures had committed, nor that he had determined millions of years before the event took place to send this innocent son to suffer for the mistakes his creatures made when following out the natures he had given them, and for doing just what he knew they must do. It does not add to his good reputation to slay a faultless son to make amends for his own mistakes or for what his other creatures had done, or to appease his own anger, nor for him to lay the plan from all eternity to do this. The longer this unjust, cruel policy was thought over the more detestible it should have become in the eyes of a perfect being. If he had created a devil with the power to lead his children astray and cause them to disobey him it was most diabolical justice that caused him to determine to slay his own faultless son in consequence. It was miserable blundering that made him so angry at the result of his own experiments that he must strike down his own son to obtain satisfaction. Or if he and his son were one and the same person, as another vagary insists, his anger at his human offspring must have been of a peculiar character that he had to smite himself to get himself into a good humor. It is a pity that in consequence of the ill success of his plans he should work himself into such a state of anger that he decided to send into eternal damnation the millions of his creatures he had brought into existence, and that he himself had to step in and take the blow designed for them, thus gaining sure revenge and appeasing divine justice. If he did not want a devil able to thwart and defeat him, why did he create him? If he did not want his human children to follow their natures and passions, why did he endow them with such passions, and wrongful desires? If he knew beforehand how his creatures would conduct themselvs, what kind of reason was he governed by that he should get terribly angry because the result came around just as he knew it would and just as he had planned it? Is it indeed divine justice that demands the punishment of the innocent in place of the guilty? Oh, that is a horrible vagary indeed! You may worship and love such a being, but I cannot, and will not.

Another of the old vagaries is that God had continual trouble with his creatures after he turned the man and woman out of the garden where four rivers had their source, and though his sons came down and cohabited with the daughters of men, which at all events should have improved the breed, they grew from bad to worse and he became more and more dissatisfied every day, until in the hight of his displeasure he decided to exterminate them all from the face of the earth by an immense flood of waters. The old vagary has it that for forty days and nights the water poured down from heaven at the rate of seven hundred and twenty-five feet per day, over thirty feet per hour, or six inches per minute, which remained on the earth the best part of a year, drowning out all the men, women, and children, all the animal creatures excepting the fishes, all trees and vegetable life, save the eight persons in the ark, and the two or three millions of animals, birds, reptiles, insects, etc., which the vagary provides to get along harmoniously in the confined darkness, without food or air, for thirteen months.

A good deal of trouble was required to bring all this about, and the worst of it is, it did little or no good, for the world was just as bad as before, and this God of infinite power and love had his patience tried to the very utmost. After getting out of all patience with the dwellers on the earth, the vagary goes on to tell us, he concluded to select out the offspring of one man and make them as numerous as the sands of the seashore, and to make them a chosen and holy people unto himself. But the stock was too bad; they did evil continually; they made him angry almost every day, so that he wished to destroy them and consume them from the earth. He led them into slavery so abject that even he got sick of it and undertook to lead them a few days' journey to a land he resolved to give them, but it took him forty years to make it.

Although he had promised them as an inheritance forever a large tract of country from the Nile to the Euphrates, they never had but a small tract of broken, mountainous country less than forty miles wide and one hundred and forty long. He led them through numerous bloody wars to gain possession of this little country he had promised to give them as a present. And during the twelve or fifteen years they had partial possession of it, they were often defeated by their enemies; they were several times rendered captives and laid under tribute, and two or three times carried off into captivity. In short, they seemed to have the most ill fortune so long as their god Yahweh paid special attention to them, and they never had much prosperity until he withdrew his "protection" from them and they scattered around among other nations of the earth. You may think me "coarse" and crude, but not more coarse and crude than are these vagaries to which you cling so tenaciously.

Another of the Christian vagaries is that the books of the Old and New Testaments were either written by God or by men inspired by him. There is not the first particle of proof to sustain this vagary. It is wholly unknown who wrote the most of the books, and there are no grounds for believing that either of them was written by inspiration. The first five books are called the books of Moses, but it is certain that Moses never wrote them nor saw them. The same with the subsequent books; most of them were written by others than those whose names they bear, and scarcely one of them sets up the pitiful pretense that it was written by inspiration, or that God had anything to do with it. I have shown that the four gospels were not written or seen by the persons to whom they are ascribed, and that "tradition is the fountain of Christian knowledge." I have shown that the miraculous conception, the maternity of the Virgin, the miracles of Jesus, his physical resurrection, and his bodily ascension were unknown in the first century, and at the very best depended upon the legends and traditions invented and fixed up in the second century by such inspired men as Irenæus. You have not as yet adduced the first proof that the opposite is the truth. All the claims upon which your system depends, all its pretensions to divinity, are the sheerest vagaries, compared with which the proofs and deductions of Prof. Newman are solids of the most permanent character. Divested of all the sanctity thrown around these vagaries by the ignorant devotees of blind faith, the tales about Jesus, his parentage, birth, miracles, resurrection, and ascension, are as ridiculous and childlike as the vagaries of any other mythology. The incarnations of Vishnu, the myth of Santa Claus, or of Puck's throwing a girdle about the earth in forty minutes are equally as sensible and equally as reliable.

It matters little in the line of reason what Irenæus thought about the crazy visions of Ezekiel, of cherubim with faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, or his far-fetched idea that the four gospels in the canon had the slightest connection with these four faces. Your quotations from another Christian writer as to the wonderful characteristics of the four gospels seem to be about of equal value with the arguments of Irenæus.

Right here let me correct a mistake which appeared in my last with reference to the casks necessary to contain Irenæus's wine. I meant to say that 300,000,000 men making a cask each per day would in six thousand years make 540,000,000,000,000; but in correcting the proof the printer misunderstood my marks and took out eight ciphers, reducing the number to 5,400,000 casks, an error of 5,399,999,946,000,000 casks, capable of containing quite too much wine to be thrown away.

I am inclined to think you deserve to be ranked with Irenæus, since you hav discovered two multiplication tables, one from 1 to 12, the other from 1 to 20. Why do you not with equal propriety call it nineteen multiplication tables—1 to 2, 1 to 3, 1 to 4, and so on? You might at least call it four multiplication tables—1 to 5, 1 to 10, 1 to 15, and 1 to 20, and thus afford another proof that God caused four gospels to be written, showing a direct connection with Irenæus's four winds, four corners of the earth, and Ezekiel's cherubim with four faces. The four gospels need all the proof that can be brought in their favor, and your multiplication should not be omitted. They prove the divinity of the four gospels equally as much as Irenæus's four winds.

As it pleases you to quote from Irenæus and a nameless "Christian writer" the wonderful qualities of the four gospels, it is but proper that I should turn very brief attention in the same direction, even if I cannot arrive at the same conclusion with you and your two authors. I will take the space to mention but a few points. Matthew is anonymous. It begins with a pretended genealogy of Jesus, showing twenty-seven generations from David to Joseph, who, according to the same chapter, bore no more blood-relationship to Jesus than to any other man. The writer of Matthew is considerable on dreams. He knows all about what Joseph dreamed more than half a century before, and points out nearly a dozen instances where certain events in the career of Jesus were done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by certain prophets, but which language in nearly every instance had not the slightest allusion to Jesus, or to anybody of his time. He was quite a fervid story-teller, and narrates with particularity most astonishing events, like the opening of the graves and walking forth of the dead, which nobody else ever heard of. In that gospel certain events like the feeding of the multitude with a very small stock of food are mentioned the second time, showing clearly that the story is a compilation of legends by two or more authors. With all his fulness of description and fondness for marvelous events he had nothing to say of the most remarkable circumstance of Jesus ascending bodily up into heaven. As a truthful historian he was very derelict in his duty to say not a word about that wonderful event. As before remarked, if Matthew ever wrote a narrative it was in Hebrew, and as this gospel was written in Greek, it could not have been written by Matthew. If in the genealogy business Luke was correct, Matthew was false.

Mark is also anonymous, but he is the briefest and simplest, and makes the least effort at effect of all. He says nothing about the miraculous conception, nothing about Christ being born of a virgin, nothing about his infancy, childhood, youth, or early manhood. There are several discrepancies between him and the other gospel writers, but I will pass them over in silence. As the writer at best was not an eye-witness of what he relates, his evidence could not have much weight in a court of justice. Like Matthew he has nothing to say of Jesus's miracle of turning water into wine, and not a word of his greatest of all miracles, raising Lazarus from the dead after he had been four days in the grave, and the process of decomposition had commenced. If these works were really performed by Jesus it was culpable on the part of those giving a full account of his deeds not to even mention them. Where three accepted witnesses say nothing of these things and only one has a word to say of them, it is very fair to conclude that the deeds were not performed.

The third gospel is anonymous, nor is the slightest claim set up that any divine aid was received in writing it. By the proem it is evident that when it was written many others had undertaken to put in writing the legends and traditions that had been current, and the writer does not show wherein his version is any better than those older than his. If the gospels of Matthew and Mark were known at the time, he does not mention them nor give them any preference over the numerous other narratives that had been produced. He puts in the claim of the advantage of being an eye-witness, but as he gives an account of many things of which he certainly was not a witness, this claim amounts to little. He, however, does not claim that he had divine assistance in writing a single passage, and had it been so he was extremely unfair and untruthful not to tell us. From reading this gospel it is very evident that the writer wrote in quite a natural manner, giving a tolerably straightforward but unreliable account of what he knew and what he had heard, without once thinking heaven was helping him to write. He attempts to give the genealogy of Jesus, but makes it totally different from Matthew save in the names of David and Joseph, neither of whom bore the slightest sanguineous relationship to Jesus. He makes Joseph to have descended through an entirely different lot of men from Matthew, mentioning forty men and generations, while Matthew has but twenty-seven. If Matthew was partially right Luke was totally wrong; and as they utterly disagree their testimony is worse than useless. They both show dishonesty, in attempting to give the genealogy of Jesus, by giving that of Joseph, who, they take particular pains to tell, was not his father and had nothing to do with his paternity. The untruthfulness on their part is quite enough to invalidate their statements in other portions of the narrative.

Luke gives an account of a remarkable interview between Gabriel and Mary, and another between the Holy Ghost and Mary, which neither of the other gospel writers knew anything about. He does not tell how he knew anything about it himself, but it surely was not from being an eye-witness. Probably it was an invention, like the genealogy, and possesses no more value. In the details he gives he disagrees in many instances with the other gospel writers, but as they all wrote by their own powers and subject to human fallibilities we will not be too critical in that direction. If they all wrote by divine direction they should have stated events alike and in the same order. But as common compilers of legends, traditions, with some powers of invention, it was not strange that they disagreed on many points and frequently contradicted each other.

Although you do not like me to repeat what I say, especially when it is a damaging truth that you do not wish to have appear, in making allusion to the fourth gospel I must mention some points alluded to before. I am rather in favor of repeating strong points and true points, and I hope not to offend by so doing.

The fourth gospel is entirely unlike the others both in detail and object. The other gospels represent the mission of Jesus to have lasted but about a year, while the fourth gospel makes it several years. The first three state that Jesus visited Jerusalem once, while the fourth gospel speaks of several visits. The fourth gospel makes Jesus the preacher of long, met aphysical, abstruse, and enigmatical sermons about which the others have nothing to say. The fourth narrative would have us believe that Jesus performed some very astonishing miracles that the other narrators knew nothing about.

It was evidently written by one familiar with Greek philosophy who was anxious to weave in the ideas of the logos as propounded by Philo, by Plato, and still earlier by the Druids. The intent to establish the messiahship of Jesus is very evident, and an intimate relationship between him and Yahweh of the Jewish mythology, the latter of whom, however, is greatly softened down, improved, refined, and etherealized. He is not near the malicious, cruel, jealous, irrascible, passionate, revengeful, and bloodthirsty deity portrayed in the Old Testament. It was doubtless written to establish the metaphysical doctrine of the trinity, and in it words are put into the mouth of Jesus, asserting his divine character, not claimed in the other narratives. The ablest writers have pronounced it a polemic, designed to disprove certain heresies rather than to give a simple, straightforward narrative of the events in the life of Jesus. These heresies had reference to the person and nature of Jesus, of which there appeared to be a great diversity of opinion in the second century. Tritely does Greg remark, "A man who writes a history to prove a doctrine must be something more than a man if he writes that history with a scrupulous fidelity of fact and coloring." This was more than the writer of John accomplished. He made the discourses of Jesus to turn almost exclusively upon the dignity of his own person—an overweening tendency to self-glorification—and this with a frequency which is hard to believe was an actuality. After reading the fourth gospel one must have the painful impression that it cannot be dealing with the genuine language of Jesus, but with a composition written with a purpose to show his superior nature and extraordinary claims to divinity, a belief in which did not exist in his time, and that the gospel was written to establish the doctrine of that divinity.

The fourth gospel strangely does not mention the immaculate conception—a very important omission; it gives no idea of how Jesus was begotten. It does not tell us how he came into the world nor how he went out of it. It has not a word to say of the remarkable ascension, of which Mark and Luke claimed to have some knowledge, though they passed over it very briefly and related it differently. It is very clear that this gospel was not written till late in the second century, and certainly was not written by John, the son of Zebidee. Another very strong proof that John did not write this gospel is the fact that it does not mention several very important incidents, as the transfiguration, the agony in Gethsemane, etc., on which occasions the other gospel writers assert that John was present. Had he been present and afterward written a gospel, he assuredly would have mentioned them. Perhaps the fidelity and reliability of this gospel may be fairly estimated by its last verse, "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." When it is realized that the smallest room in this city, yes, the smallest closet, is large enough to hold the books containing a narrative of all the events in the life of any person who lived much longer than Jesus, and was far more active, the utter falsity and absurdity of the supposition that the whole world could not contain the books giving the incidents in his short career are most apparent. That writer of such statements cannot be credited whether inspired or uninspired.

Thus while you and your Christian friends claim to see so much in the four gospels that is wonderful, beyond the power of mortals, "divine," I find nothing that is above mediocrity, nothing beyond even an ordinary person's ability, and much that is false, incongruous, contradictory, and unreliable. While you fain find in them proofs of the work of a divine mind, I find nothing but what is quite human, and of a not very elevated character at that. They abound in discrepancies about the conception of Christ, about when he was born, about Herod's murdering the innocents, about Joseph's going to Egypt, about Christ's childhood, his calling his disciples and performing his miracles, his teachings, the events in his career and the order of their occurrence, his betrayal, his arrest, his trial, his crucifixion, the inscription on the cross, what was given him to drink, what he said, his preparation for the sepulcher, his resurrection, the persons who saw him, the number of his appearances after his resurrection, the number of days between his resurrection and his ascension, his ascension, and where it occurred. On all these points and many others there are discrepancies and contradictions too numerous to mention in a hurried letter. You may by the aid of a fervid, pious imagination see a great deal of beauty and divinity in all this, an indication of something beyond what four men are capable of performing, but with my matter-of-fact mind I am unable to see anything of the kind. I see not the first particle of divinity in those four gospels, nothing superhuman in the matter conveyed, nothing superhuman in the style in which it is told. If four common farmer's sons, attending a theological seminary, could not get up four narrativs or gospels equal to those in the New Testament, they ought to be sent home to their mother, and told to go to work at plowing again. Your ability to see marks of divine power, "the peculiar glory of the gospels," as you term it, in those four rambling, discordant, common-place, discrepant, contradictory narratives, only shows the activity of your imagination and the facility with which you accept the common productions of the human mind as the declaration of the Being of infinite wisdom and knowledge. This is a startling proof of the power of superstition upon the human mind, a specimen of the delusions which have blinded the human race for thousands of years.

I will leave without fnrther argument Paul's opinion of the resurrection, as a sharp Philadelphia lawyer with two or three divines to help him could not make out exactly what Paul meant; but it is pretty evident that whatever resurrection he believed is the lot of every human being was that experienced by Jesus. We will let it rest at that. Your effort, however, to show that Paul had the least knowledge of the "miraculous conception," of his incarnation, of his miracles, and his physical ascension, I must pronounce a failure. You show nothing of the kind. Most assuredly if Paul had known anything of these wonderful things about Jesus, in all he had to say in his epistles he surely would have referred to them. In fact he would have been culpable not to have done so. Your dodge about works on astronomy and gardening does not excuse the matter.

I perhaps should not think strange that my quoting instances of your God Yahweh's cruelty, injustice, severity, and bad temper disturbs somewhat your equanimity of mind. It does indeed present a bad outlook of a being for infinite love, wisdom, and power. I admit you have quoted some passages presenting him in a somewhat less unfavorable light. You have given some passages from the Old Testament that are nearly as good as teachings from older heathen religious works.

You deny that the Jewish God, Yahweh, ordered women and children put to death in cold blood, and ask me to produce the chapter. Just turn to the 31st chapter of Numbers, read it over carefully, and think of it seriously before saying your morning and evening prayers. There you will see that this God commanded Moses to send out an army of his peculiar people and revenge themselves on the Midianites, a nation of peaceful agriculturalists. In keeping with this command of the Jewish God, they warred on the Midianites and slew all the males, including the five kings which ruled over the people. The women and children were taken captive, and, with a semblance of mercy, the soldiers did not put them to death, but after burning their cities, goods, castles, etc., took them to the camp of Israel, along with 675,000 sheep, 72,000 beeves, and 61,000 asses.

When Moses, God's vicegerent, saw that the women and little children were saved alive he became very angry and inquired, as might a demon inquire, "Have ye saved all the women alive?" Then speaking for his God, he said: "Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves." And in obedience to the command of this God whom you adore, those women and little babes were put to death in cold blood, than which a crueler deed was never performed upon this earth. Of course this chapter of "God's Word" does not say there were fifty thousand each of the women and children, nor did I suppose you would understand it that way. The fifty thousand is simply an estimate of my own, based upon the data given that it was the women and children of a whole nation which had five kings, with cities, castles, etc. With such a great amount of live stock, as well as from the number of virgins (32,000) that were turned over for the use of the soldiers and the priests, I think I am justified in making the estimate at fifty thousand, but there might have been a few thousand more or a few thousand less. It matters not that the precise number is ascertained; the principle is all the same whether it was 25,000 or 50,000, only the greater the number the more gigantic the horror.

The most diabolical proceeding in this whole business was the giving over of 32,000 innocent young women and little girls a prey to the animal passions of soldiers, together with a regular proportion for the priests, called "the Lord's portion." Just stop for a moment and realize the enormity of this horrible affair. Just think how those young women must have felt, torn by bloody soldiers from their homes, which were set on fire and destroyed, their fathers, mothers, and little brothers brutally murdered before their eyes, and they consigned by a merciful God to the foul embrace of the fiends who had performed this bloody work! Can anything more shocking be conceived? And how puerile the excuse which you and other adorers of Yahweh offer for this great iniquity—because the Midianitish women had tempted the men of Israel! How pitiful the excuse! Is it not probable that the men of Israel, in an intercourse hinted at, were just as criminal, to say the least, as the daughters of Midian? What gross injustice, then, to murder the women in cold blood and reward the men by giving them untouched virgins of the same race! If the first intercourse was wrong, was it right to command the second? Out upon such inconsistency, such "divine mercy, love, and purity" as that. Is it possi-

Decline of Christianity in Iowa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Ten years ago the Methodist Episcopal church at East Dubuque, Iowa, had a membership of over one hundred. They felt able to build a fine church edifice at a cost of four or five thousand dollars. For the last two or three years they hav been unable to pay the salary of a minister, but through the kindness of a local minister on the opposit side of the river in Dubuque, who preached to them free, they hav been enabled to keep up some show of life. At the last quarterly meeting the church was well filled, and the presiding elder prepared the sacrament. When all was ready the worthy were invited o come forward and eat Jesus. But oh, horrors, here was not one who responded! The presiding elder and the "local" had it all to themselvs. Our old friend and co-worker, D. R. Burt, livs there; that explains it. H. GILMORE.

Machinery and Civilization.

Mr. Charles C. Coffin has been giving a series of lectures in the Lowell (Mass.) Institute on our manufacturing industries and the relation of invention to civilization. From the Boston Advertiser we make the following extracts from one of these lectures:

The first need of men in this world is for something to eat; the second is for something to wear. The earliest historical allusion to the manufacture of textil fabrics is the simile in the oldest poem extant —the book of Job—the comparison of the swiftness of time to the weaver's shuttle. The weaver's shuttle of the East and the loom of the Orient through all the centuries hav not changed. Throughout Asia, and even in some sections of Italy and Spain, the spindle of to-day is like that which Penelope deftly twirled when preparing garments for her absent lord. The use of machinery in the manufacture of clothing has been a powerful agency in modern civilization. Out of the multitudinous machines of the present century I select those for spinning and weaving to represent the progress of mechanic art. It is noteworthy that the first movement in free intellectual thought in antagonism to the dogmatism of the middle ages and the first mechanism to relieve woman from unceasing toil were coincident. During those years in which Martin Luther, Melancthon, and their compeers were awaking the world to a new intellectual and religious life, a German carpenter constructed the spinning wheel, which made its appearance about 1530. The knitting machine was the second invention—the device of a young curate of Nottingham, the Rev. Wm. Lee; and during those months when the Mayflower was crossing the Atlantic the first stockings knit by the machine were placed on the market.

The lecturer commented upon the fact that the century following Lee's invention rolled away without any invention. Men were giving their attention to other things. The spirit of the age was against invention. The learned were lost in abstractions, were regardless of human needs, utterly ignorant of the resources of nature to alleviate human woe or to lift men to a higher plane of life. Another reason why inventions did not come earlier was that all Christendom, through the middle ages and down to the beginning of the present century, was engaged in war. The conditions were all adverse to scientific research. In 1781, just one hundred years ago, came Watt's first working engin, with a condenser and the steam applied to propel the piston in both directions.

Aside from the very few wind and water mills, the human race at the beginning of the present century was living by its own muscular energy, digging and delving, spinning and weaving, with rude instruments and mechanisms.

The world is more enlightened now, but there are are still many people who cannot see how the introduction of a machine which will do the work of many men can be promotiv of the well being of the community. Imagin yourselvs as standing on the bank of the Merrimac, in 1821, with Nathan Appleton, William Appleton, Patrick T. Jackson, Kirk Boott, John W. Boott, Paul Moody, and Nathaniel Bowditch. No sound breaks the stillness, save the rushing of the water over the rocks. It is the energy of nature running to waste, and these gentlemen determined to set it to work for their individval welfare. They purchased the surrounding farms and the old canal which other men had constructed for the passage of rafts, set themselvs to enlarging it, and in building a dam, not working with their own hands, but summoning the farmers, who came with their oxen to haul rocks. Stone-masons are wanted, and the blacksmith to sharpen their tools. Young men come down from Vermont and New Hampshire to dig the canal. The gentlemen who are pushing the enterprise need bricks. Another class of laborers is called for. Lumber is needed, and sawmills are set to humming. Masons, hodcarriers, mixers of mortar, lime burners are set to work, with still more oxen, more teamsters, and cartmen, besides coopers to make the casks for the lime. An architect plans the manufactory; the carpenters frame it, and a corps of joiners finish it. A millwright calculates the power, sets another corps of men at work constructing the great wheel. The manufacturers of the spinning and carding and weaving machines hav regiments hammering and filing brass, steel, and iron. They in turn hav set the founders, puddlers, and smelters to work. Furnaces send up their lurid flames; vessels are sailing on the ocean to fetch and carry materials. The miners far down in the earth, the sailor climbing the shrouds in mid-ocean, the millwright lost in thought as he calculates the power of nature's energy, the brickmaker molding the plastic clay, the joiner plying his plane, the teamster urging his cattle; all hav been called from former vocations to aid in building the mills. Why hav they come? Because these gentlemen offer them more remunerativ wages than they hav been receiving.

Let us follow on. The mills are erected, the machines are in place, but human hands are still needed. The gentlemen summon the farmers' sons and daughters by the inducement of better wages. Hav the gentlemen thrown any one out of employment? They hav changed labor; they hav made the spinning wheel and loom of the household useless lumber, not throwing the old-time spinners and weavers out of employment, but transferring them to one in which they can do more for themselvs and their fellow-men. You ask, perhaps, what the masons, joiners, and carpenters who built the mill are to do when the mill is completed? Are they not out of employment? The mill is only the beginning. Dwelling-houses are needed, stores, shops for the grocer, butcher, baker, joiner, mason, blacksmith—the whole fraternity of trades and occupations. The first mill erected at Lowell was the beginning of a city to-day numbering between fifty thousand and sixty thousand inhabitants. It will be instructiv in this connection to see what labor and capital together will accomplish through the use of the energy of nature, in giving value to raw materials.

The Southern farmer plows his land, casts in the cotton seed. He sells his crop at twelve cents per pound, obtaining a livelihood by agricultural labor. The operativ in Lowell, by manufacturing it into muslin, may make it worth eighty cents; by more delicate manipulation into lace worth $1. But before the process could be undertaken by the machinist, the iron manufacturers were called upon to construct the machinery. The ore which the miner dug from the ground, and which he sold for seventy-five cents, the iron smelter sold for $5. The machinist makes it worth $100. If, instead of putting it into spindles and wheels, it had been sold to the manufacturer of fine needles, he would hav made it worth $6,800. The manufacturer of watch springs would hav made it worth $200,000; or if he were to use it for pallet arbors it would be worth $2,577,595. Past earnings and present labor together giv this increased value to the seventy-five cents' worth of ore.

Invention renders old things obsolete and so is destructiv; but there is a force more destructiv than invention, a force that not only drives men from occupation, but upon the instant consigns their costly machines to destruction—a force wielded almost wholly by the female sex—the force of fashion, a power stronger than the combined strength of inventors, manufacturers, and operativs. Not long ago every woman in this audience quite likely regarded a hoopskirt as necessary to make her wardrobe complete. Probably not less than 25,000,000 were manufactured per annum, requiring an outlay of many millions of dollars for complicated machinery, furnaces, and rolling mills for the foundation of steel, manufactures for the weaving of tape, employing many thousand operativs; but suddenly the idea gained possession of the female mind that dress would be more graceful and pleasing to the eye without them, and they were upon the instant discarded, bringing about quick destruction to the manufactures and loss of occupation to the operativs.

Invention is an educator. It begins with thought. The more thought put into his machine by the inventor the higher the intelligence to operate it. Mechanics has become a distinct profession, requiring high mathematics, physics, and the power of abstract thought. Trade and commerce recognize the new profession by offering it their highest pecuniary rewards. It is the master mechanic, receiving his salary of $15,000 per annum, who is the cheapest employé of some corporations in this country. Fifty years ago, in 1830, the spindles of the world were as follows: United States, 1,000,000; Europe, 2,000,000; Great Britain, 8,000,000. To-day the United States has 11,000,000; Europe, 20,000,000; Great Britain, 40,000,000. In cotton manufacture it is estimated that one man to-day is able to do the work of 1,000 hand laborers, and that the cotton, silk, and woolen industries of to-day would require the labor of every human being if prepared by hand labor.

One hundred years ago, when thread numbered 150 by the standard set up by spinners was considered the utmost degree of fineness possible by English spinners, a pound of cotton spun to such fineness would giv a thread 74 miles in length, sufficient to reach from Boston to Concord, N. H. The machinery of to-day spins for useful purposes thread numbered 600—from one pound a thread 196 miles in length. And machinery has been constructed so delicate that a pound of cotton has given a thread reaching 1,061 miles—farther than from Boston to Chicago! The weaver of my boyhood could throw the shuttle perhaps twenty-five times a minute, but not at that rate through the day. Human muscle would break down under such rapid action. In 1850 Compton's loom threw the shuttle fifty times a minute, whereas so great has been the advance of invention, that the loom of to-day is considered a slow-moving mechanism if the shuttle does not fly 240 times a minute! "No man can afford to take as a gift to-day a cotton manufactory equipped with the machinery of 1860," was the remark of the late superintendent of the Amoskeag Mills. "We are breaking up the machinery of those days for old iron."

In some departments of cotton manufacture a man with the present machines will do eight times the amount of work which he could accomplish in 1860. In the manufacture of coarse cloth an operativ with ten machines does twice the work which he could accomplish with thirteen machines before the war. There never was a period so fruitful in discovery, so fertil in invention, as the present, and the reason is manifest. The first discoverers and inventors groped in the dark. They were ignorant of nature's laws. They did not know what force was. They had a limited comprehension of what the simple mechanical powers were. There was little accumulated wealth of research.

In contrast, the mechanic of to-day has all the discoveries, the experiments, the ascertained facts, mathematics of machinery, the laws of force at his command. He inherits the scientific wealth of all the past and makes it his capital. Instead of gazing, as it were, upon old mines worked out, he beholds mountain ranges filled with golden ore, and engages in his work with the stimulus of the needs of the human race, and the ever-increasing wants of an advancing civilization.

Is Man a Free or Necessary Agent?

Man is a necessary agent if he be irresistibly compelled at each instant of time to do that which he does; if his entire conduct is the result of antecedent causes; if all his actions are so determined by the causes preceding each action that not one past action could possibly not hav come to pass or hav been otherwise than it has been; nor one future action can possibly not come to pass or be otherwise than it shall be.

He is a free agent if he is able at any time, under the circumstances he then is, to do different things; or, if he is not unavoidably determined in every point of time by the circumstances he is in, and causes he is under, to do the one thing he does, and not possibly to do any other.

This, certainly, is a fair statement of the question. At all times, when this most difficult of all questions has been raised, the advocates of freedom hav exultingly appealed to human experience as the incontestable and irrefragable proof of the liberty of human actions. Those who hav not studied the subject are persuaded that they feel themselvs free on a thousand occasions simply because they do not properly attend to or do not see the causes of their actions, and thence conclude they are free or not moved by causes to do what they do. They also frequently regret their actions, and because, when in the penitent humor, they hav no present motivs to do these actions, they conclude they might not hav done them at the time they did them, and that they were free from necessity (as they were from outward impediments) in doing them. They also find that they can do as they will, and forbear as they will, without any external impediment to hinder them doing as they will, let them will either doing or forbearing. They likewise see that they often change their minds; that they can and do choose differently every successiv moment; that they frequently deliberate and are sometimes at a near balance and in a state of indifference, and suspend their judgments about some propositions, and defer willing or choosing with respect to some objects. Experiencing these things, they mistake them for the exercise of freedom from necessity.

But let us see if experience will warrant the conclusion that man is a free agent. Because we will to do or forbear doing some act, or because we frequently change our wills, or deliberate and suspend our judgment, are we therefore free to will or not to will? Certainly, we possess no such liberty. Let it be proposed to any one to do some act within his power, as, for instance, to go, to stay, to stand, to sit, and instantly the will to go or not to go exists immediately. He is compelled from the necessity of the case to determin either to go or not to go; he cannot avoid willing some way or other in the premises, and therefore is not free to will or not to will. Perhaps it will be said that he may will neither to go or not to go, but may deliberate about the matter, and thus suspend his judgment. This only changes the proposition by introducing another term. He is no less compelled either to will to go or not to go, or to will to defer willing about the matter. And therefore man is a necessary agent, and not free to will or not to will.

Now let us suppose that he willed not to go. At the instant he determined not to go, was it possible for him to determin also to go? Manifestly not, because a man cannot hav two wills different and opposit to each other at the same time. If, then, it was impossible for him to will to go, certainly he was obliged to will to stay, and therefore man is not free to will or not to will.

The actions of men also follow the same inexorable necessity which governs the will. The instant we will to do anything, as to go or to stay, to eat or to drink, we find we must do these things, unless some obstacle or intervening cause prevents, in which case we are just as much compelled to desist from such actions as we were to execute them in accordance with our wills had no such hindrance occurred. Grant that after having begun an action we change our will. In such case we no less necessarily cease the action and follow our new will. Hence I conclude that our experience proves that man is a necessary and not a free agent.

Another irrefutable reason why man is a necessary agent is because all his actions hav a beginning, and everything that has a beginning must hav a cause, otherwise nothing could produce something, which is too great an absurdity to dispute about.

Now all causes, to be causes at all, must be necessary causes, otherwise causes would not be adequate or suited to their effects, and might be free to produce other and different results.

The union of oxygen and hydrogen in certain proportions is the necessary cause of water. If not necessarily so, then it might be free to produce capriciously anything else. Whatever is necessarily caused cannot be free. Therefore liberty to act or not to act, to do this or something else under the same causes, is utterly impossible.

Again, if man was free to giv or withhold his assent to what seems reasonable and true, if he was indifferent to pleasure and pain, and could prefer the latter and decline the former, he would be the most wretchedly imperfect, vicious, and unteachable of beings. All inducements, rewards, advice, and reasons would fall upon him as dull and impassivly as upon a rock. Offer him the most cogent of arguments, present him with pleasure and pain, and he would manifest no more appreciation of them than might be expected from a corpse. He might reject what appears true to him, and assent to what seems false and absurd. He might avoid what he sees to be good, and choose what he sees to be evil. Liberty to deny truth when we perceive it, to choose pain and refuse pleasure, is a direct obstacle to knowledge, happiness, and perfection. It seems very strange to me that engins and machinery of all kinds are regarded as more perfect the more they are compelled to go right, and yet that it should be deemed a desirable attribute, a perfection in man, not to be governed by his perceptions of the right and true, and not to be necessarily determined by his reason, but to hav the liberty to act contrary to it. Oftentimes in the discussion of this question much is made to depend upon the notions about God and his attributes prevalent among men. I can scarcely deem it important to consider any arguments drawn from the supposed existence of a being so contradictory in himself and so universally unknown among men. But since there are persons who flatter themselvs that they hav an acquaintance (though it be at a very long range) with the celestial monarch, for their satisfaction we will consider a salient argument urged with great confidence by the patrons of liberty. They assure us that if man be not free then God must be the author of evil; at least he compels men to sin and then punishes them for doing what they could not avoid, which, they say, is an absurdity, and is impossible. Well, truly, this is a very unenviable situation, and is very rough on God. And I fear it would hav to continue so, though man were free, for certainly infinit benevolence would, and infinit power could, remove evil from this world. But since evil remains, therefore the conclusion is unavoidable—either God is impotent, or he is malignant, or perhaps both, or there is no God. The latter is the more satisfactory conclusion, and the only one that accords with good sense and correct reasoning.

But for the sake of the argument, let us suppose the existence of God, any sort, whatever most suits the fancy of the reader. Then certainly this being must be endowed with the attribute of prescience, otherwise he would not amount to the dignity and importance of a gypsy fortune-teller. The divine prescience, then, necessarily supposes that all future events must certainly happen in their proper time and order, for if any future events were contingent or depended on the liberty of man, i. e., might or might not happen, then their certain existence could not be the object of divine prescience, for it is a contradiction to know that to be certain which is not certain.

The foreknowledge of any event does certainly and necessarily infer that there must be such an event, since the certainty of knowledge depends upon the certainty of the thing known. But let us suppose man to be a free agent. Even this will not relieve the difficulty and exonerate God from the responsibility of sin. For if man possesses this fatal gift, it must hav been bestowed upon him by God, the source of all his faculties. God must hav had some purpose in thus endowing man, since he can do nothing idly or without a motiv. And being omnipotent he cannot fail in any of his purposes. Therefore all events must be in harmony with the divine intention. We are obliged to conclude that whatever happens was intended and foreordained by God. Sin has resulted from free agency; and therefore God is the author of sin, or the author of an attribute which he predetermined should result in sin, which is the same thing.

Another irrefragable argument against liberty is, if man was not a necesssry agent, determined is his volitions and actions by pleasure and pain, there would be no sense or use whatever in establishing rewards and punishments as incentivs to virtue and preventivs of vice. If men could be indifferent to pleasure and pain, and not necessarily determined by them; if pleasure and pain were not causes to influence and constrain men's judgments and determinations, of what use would be the hope of rewards as inducements to the practice of virtue or the fear of punishments as a means of preventing crimes? If men could love pain and hate pleasure, could desire the former and avoid the latter, then certainly rewards and punishments could be no incentivs or motivs to a man to cause him to do or forbear an action. But if pleasure and pain do necessarily determin men, and if it be impossible for men not to desire what seems good to them, and not to escape what seems evil, then the propriety of rewards and punishments is evident. Rewards will influence those who regard them as pleasant and agreeable, and punishments will deter those who conceive them to be painful.

Another reason why man is a necessary agent is that if men were not necessarily determined by pleasure and pain, if they did not irresistibly choose the former and avoid the latter, the whole foundation of morals would be overturned, and all distinction between good and bad, virtue and vice, be wholly obliterated. Morality consists in the practice of such actions as are pleasant and agreeable, and vice in such as are painful. If men were indifferent to pleasure and pain, they could therefore hav no conception of what is pleasant or unpleasant, and therefore could hav no notion of morality and could not distinguish it from immorality. They would be without a motiv to practice the one and avoid the other. Man at present is bad enough by mistaking pain for pleasure and thereby going astray; but if he was indifferent to pleasure and pain, he would hav no means of judging good and evil, and might never determin anything correctly.

It is objected, how can man's conscience accuse him if he knows he acts necessarily? Some poet has said that "conscience is a base accuser." At best it is simply a man's own opinion of his conduct with reference to some rule, and when violating that rule, may be conscious of the fact, and therefore act with some reluctance, but not enough to prevent his action. But afterwards, on account of the absence of some pleasure that he expected as a consequence of his infraction of the rule, or the presence of pain which he had hoped to avoid, he may actually accuse himself, be sorry for his conduct, and possibly think he might hav done differently if he would. But his great difficulty was that at that particular instant he couldn't would.

Ah, if we could only do a thing and leave it undone at the same time, how gloriously free we would be, and what a wonderful convenience it would sometimes be to us!

It is also objected, if men necessarily commit crimes, it would be unjust to punish them for doing what they could not avoid doing. Let's see. The object of all just punishments instituted by society is the suppression and prevention of crime, which is effected either by the extinction of the criminal or by deterring him with the fear of punishment. If crimes are prevented by the fear of punishment, certainly it is so only because the fear of punishment necessarily determined him to forbear committing the crime, and not because he was a free agent. When we execute a murderer it is evident that the justness of his punishment in no manner depends upon any free agency in him. On the contrary, we destroy him because he is necessarily determined to crime; because he is so unhappily organized that the fear of punishment does not necessarily deter him from vice and determin him to virtue. If his vicious habits could be corrected, if he could be made to be virtuous, it would be eminently proper to spare him. But because he is necessarily incorrigible, because society cannot induce him to prefer the good, because he is necessitated to choose evil always, therefore we destroy this vicious nuisance, just as we would kill a rattlesnake, shoot a mad dog, or confine a dangerously insane person, all of which are universally admitted to be necessary agents.

MISERERE.

WHATSOEVER is our own, let us do what we can, stands a little too near us to be viewed as it should; and though we ever so sincerely aim at truth, yet our own thoughts, judging still of our own thoughts, may be suspected to overlook errors and mistakes. And I should think he valued himself more than truth and presumed too much on his own abilities, who would not be willing to hav all the exceptions that could be made, by any ingenious friend, before he ventured anything into the public.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

A belief does not necessarily make a man any better. The devils believe and tremble. You find good men and bad men believing all sorts of creeds. Some men are uninfluenced by the noblest creeds, though they assert to them; some are uninjured by the lowest and basest.—T. F. Clarke.

ble that you can revere such love, such justice, and such divine commands?

It is enough to chill the heart's blood to think that such conduct was ever commanded by a God of mercy and love, and it is nearly as bad that an amiable, just man like yourself should defend it and approve of it. I am sure so great an act of cruelty is hardly laid to the charge of any of the pagan gods. This is one of the proofs that Yahweh was one of the most cruel, relentless, and bloodthirsty gods ever devised by man. And, in the face of all this, you ask me to accept him as a being of infinite mercy, purity, and love, but indeed I cannot do it. I regard him as a greater monster than any fiend I ever heard of. I should be ashamed to be counted among his adorers. I could not respect nor love him, and I can hardly esteem those who do. It avails nothing that you are able to quote a few good passages from his book. The cruel, merciless, relentless, damnable parts still remain. "The blood will not out." The old Bible has many more, but I will not name them now.

I again find myself unable to review your apologies for the defects of Jesus, but hope to reach them in my next. Truly yours, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

BARTLETT, IOWA, April 10, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I will inclose five dollars to secure the history of your circumnavigation, if such is accomplished. Yours, etc., CHAS. CHAMBERS.

ADRIAN, MICHIGAN, April 9, 1881.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. Put me down for $5 for your trip round the world.

Your friend, etc., L. VANDERBURG.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, April 17, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You will find inclosed two dollars. Please giv me credit on the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER; and also put me down for $5 to carry you round the world. The money is ready whenever called for. I hope T. B. Wakeman will bust Devil Comstock at Albany. Your sincere friend in the bonds of truth and science, H. B. CARPENTER.

GIBBONSVILLE, CAL., April 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I, too, want to be a subscriber to the around-the-world fund. When the time for action comes let me know and your $5 will be forthcoming. Yours truly, W. W. WOOD.

EDEN STATION, WIS., April 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $3 for your valuable paper. We would not think of doing without it. Its eye-opening arguments, even here, are doing no small amount of good in the way of spreading the light. Its arguments are broad, strong, and convincing, and no thoughtful mind can peruse its pages without profiting thereby.

Your European letters are highly interesting. Place my name on the list for $5 if you conclude to go round the world. From an Infidel friend,

W. N. KELLOGG.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., April 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting to see what the prospect would be in raising the amount upon which you proposed to undertake a trip round the world upon, and it seems by your many correspondents offering each a "V," that the prospect is good, hence you may put me down for $5, to be paid at any time it may be wanted for the purpose. If any hav delayed for the reason that I hav, and hence are guilty with me in retarding the movement, that reason or inconsistent cause for delay no longer exists.

I think you hav under-estimated the amount it would be safe to start on, and think a larger amount should be raised; and think you should hav some congenial friend with you, for a step of that kind by a lone one would be lonely indeed, and then one could wait upon the other in case of sickness, unless both perchance be sick at the same time, which would not be likely. I think a man able to furnish his own means might be found to accompany you on satisfactory terms to both, for an interest, for instance, in the book proposed.

Respectfully, WM. HART.

WILMOT, O., April 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $5, for which credit F. Frank $3 for his year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, for which please send receipt. For the balance please send me one copy of "An Infidel Abroad;" also one copy of Mrs. Besant and Hatchard's debate.

Put me down for $5 for your journey round the world. To me such a trip seems rather an arduous undertaking for an old man like yourself. Still, you are the doctor, as the saying goes; you know better what you can endure than I do. My opinion is that your trip would increase the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER largely, and be as much of an advantage to the Liberal cause as anything you could do. If you think you can stand the trip and enjoy it, I would say, Try it, and my ardent well wishes shall be with you clear around the circle.

Respectfully yours, JAMES ALLEN.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH, April 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I owe you almost one year's subscription for your most valuable paper. At present, I am a little short of money, and I should not like to miss it for one week, for this reason I ask you to send it along regular. In a short time I shall send you five dollars, which pays for this year, I believe. If I can manage it I will send you $5 more for your trip round the world. Hoping you will hav patience a little, I remain, Yours respectfully,

HENRY J. PESSINK.

NEW BALTIMORE, MICH., April 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav $5 for your pilgrimage. But don't go alone; take an artist with you and giv us a picture of everything worthy of note to assist your pen pictures. Take a person to assist you in your researches, as well as for company. Two persons can see more than one. Even the Jews hav to hav three persons in God in order to run the world, and then they make some mistakes, and hav to call in the devil to lay their mistakes to him, and then a host of priests to tell them how hot to keep the furnace for those that don't believe and pay. Take some one of your own choosing, and I will go $5 better. Set a day. Call on the money two months before you want to start. See the cash before you get ready. Get thoroughly prepared, if you hav to wait till next year.

"What $1.50 Will Do" is advertised in your paper. Please send them and oblige. If not convenient, send $1.50 worth of your leaflets. Inclosed find post-office order for $2.50. Wishing you much success in the cause of truth, I remain, Yours, ABEL DAVIS.

MUSKEGON, MICH., April 17, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: We are not strangers, though I hav never seen you. I hav shared somewhat in your sorrows and joys, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome visitor to our home every week. I find you hav so many friends who dare to do and say such noble things in your defense that I take heart and say the dark clouds and superstition of the past are having the blaze of the electric light thrown amongst them, and man shall yet triumph. We hav a case here in which an Episcopal minister, a Mr. Fellows, has seen the light and stepped down and out. He held service in the Opera House before six hundred people. Now, Mr. Bennett, with reference to your trip round the world, you can count on me for $5, and I hope you will be able to go. Please send me Mr. Henry George's "Progress and Poverty," extra cloth, $1.50, for which find inclosed the amount.

WM. JONES, SEN.

CORRY, PA., April 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hope that you will succeed in going round this earth, and if I can raise $5 will let you hav it, for I want the book; but if you can do the most good by staying at home, I say stay at home. Yours truly, GILBERT ARNOLD.

FREDONIA, N. Y., April 15, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: I hav got you a new subscriber. Send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to S. P. Williams, Sheridan, Chautauqua county, New York. I send one dollar to repair Paine's monument, and one dollar for Mr. Hacker. I will send you in due time $5 if you will stay at home and run THE TRUTH SEEKER until Comstock & Co. retire from their mean business. J. H. NORTHRUP.

BISHOP CREEK, CAL., April 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I think, with Mrs. Parkhurst, that you had better not take that trip round the world yet. You are more needed at the post you now fill far better than few, if any others, can. I will giv you more to stay at home than to go.

L. HUTCHINSON.

NEW YORK MILLS, April 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Now as for your trip round the world, I am one that is opposed to it. I fully coincide with Mrs. Grace Parkhurst, A. F. Green, J. H. Cook, and some others. But I presume we shall be in the minority, and probably you will go. I will readily giv the $5 for the three volumes, but would sooner giv the same for you to stay at home; and if you don't go you may draw on me for that amount. In sending you off at this time seems to me like an army sending one of their best generals home on a furlough just on the eve of an impending great battle. I don't feel that I hav a right to dictate or advise you if you go what to do, or what places to visit, or what relics to look after, such as the tomb of Adam, and the resting-place of Noah and Moses, and the sepulcher of Christ, and Lot's wife, etc.

Yours respectfully, OLIVER GARDNER.

ASHLAND, OR., March 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Liberal works are being widely circulated through the West, and the good they hav already done cannot be estimated by dollars and cents. To our authors and lecturers the world owes a debt she can never repay; yet it is a consolation to know that their names and works will ever be treasured in the memory of a grateful people. Liberalism has in the field to-day some of the greatest orators the world ever saw; and with the co-operation of many of the ablest journals of the age, success is certain. The coolness of the church, and the indifference which the dogmas of orthodoxy meet with the most intelligent of mankind, point unmistakably to the dawning of a new era, when the priest, in robes of fine linen, will hav no power to bind the ignorant in fetters of slavery. Policy no longer gags the mouth of the lawyer, the doctor, the merchant, or the politician, but all express themselvs according to their honest convictions. The village from which I write contains about one thousand inhabitants; and in view of the fact that it supports no saloons or other places of vice, it justly merits a wide reputation for morality. The principal portion of our citizens are strongly inclined toward Infidelity, and discussions on the subject are frequently indulged in. The sweet aroma from the altar of truth is wafted on every breeze, leaving our Christian friends to hover round the dying coals that were kindled in feudal times. The idea of a golden throne, a heaven, a hell, and a personal deity are rapidly passing away. The fagot and the stake are no longer used to convince men of the "truth of the cause of Christ." In future, science will test every ism before the world will accept it. The idea of employing a state lecturer is favorably entertained at present by the leading Liberals of Oregon. A movement is also on foot for the publication of a Liberal journal at this place. Yours fraternally,

J. Q. LATTA.

LANGLADE, April 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: For such I must call you, as your paper has really made us friends, and I am only sorry that I cannot this time inclose the price of my subscription, with which I am in arrears since the 1st of January. But be sure I shall send it as soon as possible.

I wanted to remark to Mr. W. S. Wood that there was, according to the Bible, one woman created when man was created, for in the first chapter of Genesis, if I am not mistaken (as I don't keep a Bible, I may misquote some words), it says that he created man, male and female created he them. In the Hebrew text we find barora (created), but Adam was not created. I think the word awsa is used, which means "made," and which is also right, as he made him out of the dust. If I should be able, I will try and subscribe for your travel around the world, as your travels in Europe hav been the finest and truest I hav ever seen. Yours truly, HENRY STRAUSS.

OTTO, IOWA, April 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find five dollars—three to apply on my subscription, and two for the "Revelations of Antichrist." Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! I hav taken it from the beginning, and I hope to continue taking it as long as I liv, and then would like to hav you send it on to me in the next world, if there is a next world. I think it would be a welcome sheet in any sphere. Orthodoxy drags where THE TRUTH SEEKER is read. There hav been three revivals held the past winter along the Sioux Valley, and not a convert that I hav heard of. Their battery don't work good here. Yours for truth,

S. R. DAY.

NORDHOFF, CAL., Mar. 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BEENETT: I like your new dress, and think the paper improved in other respects. Some of your correspondents are grand. What a brave and noble woman is sister Slenker! I believe she is right every time on the sexual question. This coast is swarming with invalids, the most of whom hav exhausted their vitality through sexual dissipation. I hope you will be able to make the trip around the world, but am not at present in a condition to advance any of the needful. We want some one to expose the frauds and debaucheries of the Christian missionaries who are sent to convert the heathen. From all the information I hav been able to gather there is probably not a more vile set of miscreants anywhere than is to be found among missionaries. Their work is generally among the lowest classes, and there are quite a number of them on this coast, who, having exhausted their vitality through debauchery among the heathen, hav come to California to recuperate.

Yours fraternally, FRED ROBINSON.

MANTENO, ILL., April 8, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I want to thank George Lynn through THE TRUTH SEEKER for what he said in regard to your trip around the world, and Mrs. Bennett. No one seems to think that women hav any rights that should be respected. Only think of the long weary months Mrs. Bennett has already worked and waited alone, and now to think of you leaving her again, perhaps for years. You away enjoying yourself, and she at home, lonely, anxious, working, and waiting for tidings of the loved one so far away. How would you like it? How would any man?

I enjoyed reading your letters from Europe very much, and undoubtedly would enjoy your letters on your second trip, should you go, but I would not purchase one pleasure at the expense of a fellow-creature's happiness, least of all at the happiness of a sister woman. We would all like to make that journey did our means permit; at least I for one would like to go. As I cannot I will giv ten dollars if Mrs. Bennett can go along. If not, nothing, as I think you had better slay at home with her.

Yours for right and justice, M. J. BARNARD.

PITTSFORD, N. Y., April 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER (which I hav taken from the commencement), I wish to say that I am much pleased with the new dress and heading in which the paper appears, and the print is so clear and so easy to read that it is all one can wish, especially to those with failing eyes.

Your excellent letters from Europe were very interesting, as well as instructiv. It has been a wonder to me how you had time to see so much and get so much information in so short a time and in a condensed manner. You are the boss letter writer. I hope you will get enough money for your trip round the world. Your letters made me think of the great pleasure I took years ago in the letters of Bayard Taylor and that noblest of women, Margaret Fuller (how I mourned her sad death!) and the letters of that friend of his race, the noble Horace Greeley, as they appeared in that then best of papers, the Tribune. Then it was the people's paper. To think that such a paper should become the organ of the money power and monopolist is enough to make dear old Horace's bones turn over in their coffin.

T. B. Wakeman is always sound. His articles on "Constructiv Liberalism" are very valuable. He is one of our soundest heads. T. C. Leland writes with a sharp, incisiv pen. Dear old Elizur Wright, like most of the old stock of Abolitionists, is sound on personal liberty and rights. Elmina is always interesting. Noble, big-hearted James Parton is a worthy example of moral courage. With such friends we may well feel proud of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The "Letters From Friends" are very interesting reading. Yours for the right and personal liberty,

SAMUEL CRUMP.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., March 27, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just read your article the "Electrical Appliances," and hasten to congratulate you on outgrowing another delusion—that of drug medication, for it certainly is as great as the taking of "Christ's blood" for spiritual ailments. I am daily dumbfounded at the ignorance and superstition of so-called Liberals in this respect. Some twenty-five years ago the scales fell from my eyes, and then and there began the fight for freedom, both physically and mentally. Had you included in Nature's materia medica pure, simple foods, you would hav stood on my platform exactly, for I contend it is what we eat and drink and the kind of air we breathe that makes the blood pure or otherwise, hereditary taints excepted. I am so glad you hav taken hold of this subject, for I've been pounding away these many years at Infidels to leave sickness and disease to the Christians and their God. You possibly will remember my writing you on this subject when you were in prison—begging you to take care of your health, not to violate the laws of nature, etc. I think it is a shame and a disgrace for Freethinkers to be on a par with Christians. I would hav Infidels so much better than religionists ever can be that, seeing our good ways, they would be constrained to follow us. I am an enthusiast over the health question. Having once been an invalid, and regaining health simply by a rigid observance of the laws of life, I am anxious every one should liv aright. But I weary you, I fear, so will say adieu.

With kind regards, ever, ABBIE KNAPP.

POSTVILLE, IOWA, March 26, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: One of your patrons in this village kindly permits me to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I must say there is such a variety of subjects that nearly everyone must be suited, otherwise they are very hard to please. Among your correspondents of March 19th is one by N. H. Weidenbach, of Hazleton, Pa., whose letter has tempted me for the first time to send a letter for publication. I like the letter very much; it bears the marks of sincerity and truthfulness. I admire his verses more for what he suggests than for any merit in the piece itself. I hope he will pardon me for expressing my thoughts on the same subject, but under another name.

I do not like to associate the name of the immortal Thomas Paine with the word infidelity, for there is no name in history that better deserves the highest place in our affections for a love of truth, honor, and fidelity. He descends from a race of men and women whom the world in derision called Quakers, but who are nevertheless justly entitled to the name which they chose for themselvs—Friends; and Thomas Paine was the "noblest Roman of them all," and in every sense, morally, intellectually, and socially, he was a Friend—the friend of poor, king-oppressed, and priest-ridden humanity. Therefore I dedicate the following verses to Paine under the name of

FIDELITY.

Paine struck the key-note long ago—
"Leave reason free! Break all her chains!"
Authority soon felt the blow
When men began to use their brains.

Paine pierced the clouds and rent the veil
That shrouds the fable and the creed;
O'er Christendom there rose a wail
When faith gave place to thought and deed.

The tyrant king assailed his life;
The coward priest assailed his fame.
Thus fraud and force in eager strife
Combined to blast a noble name.

The hero sleeping in his grave
Heeds not the malice of his foes;
The lies of any petty knave
Cannot disturb his sweet repose.

Lo! o'er his tomb a giant stands;
Paine's truth and genius thrill his soul;
He seized the liars in his hands,
They shrieked, "Oh, spare us, Ingersoll!"

No mercy showed the valiant Bob;
The lying priesthood begged in vain;
Hypocrisy, stripped of her robe,
Trembled before the ghost of Paine.

The age of faith has been—is past;
The age of reason comes to stay;
Truth, now triumphant, reigns at last—
THE TRUTH SEEKER. "So let us pray."

Thy friend, SUSAN S. MERRITT.

ST. GEORGE, UTAH, March 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Ventilation is the most healthy thing in the world, and your paper is the best ventilator on this planet. Here are three dollars to keep the pores open for another year.

Yours truly, W. E. DODGE.

SO. DARTMOUTH, MASS., March 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As it seems to be in order for all the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER to giv their opinion in regard to the contemplated tour round the world, I would like to write a few words. My opinion is similar to that of Elvira Wheelock and Grace L. Parkhurst. I think you had better stay at home. I do not doubt that in the event of your making the tour some able, competent, and talented person would occupy the editorial sanctum. Still there is nothing you know like having the editor himself at home to attend to his paper. I believe you can do more service here at home in America in the cause of Freethought than if you were occupied in traversing the globe any quantity of times. Hoping you will conclude to remain at home, I remain, Yours,

EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

DAVIS, LA., April 25, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I hav not received THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 1st; it must hav miscarried. I cannot afford to lose a copy, especially that one, as it contains a part of Mrs. Besant's debate. Would it be asking too much for me to request you to send me the missing number, if you hav it to spare? I am glad to see that so many Liberals are pledging themselvs to the "Around the World Trip." I am certain that it will be sure to giv the cause which we love additional impetus. Besides, the book which is to be the fruit of the trip will be an ornament to any home, and doubtless an intellectual feast to any reader. This country in which I liv is fearfully superstitious. The church is triumphant. The people are generally very ignorant, consequently very devoted to religion. I am the only Liberal, or Infidel, if you please, so far as I know, in this section. I hav, as you may infer, a rough and unpleasant time fighting the battle for liberty alone. But I console myself with the reflection that in her cause and for the sake of right and humanity I can bear the scoffs and sneers of the church and her partisans. For several years I was a minister of the gospel. I found many things in the Bible and in the practices of the church which I could not sanction or indorse. These things aroused suspicions as to the divinity of the one and the right of the other. I began to study and investigate for myself, and from a near standpoint—that of reason. I found that my creed, my Bible, and my religion were, when viewed from the position which I had assumed, rotten, worthless, and a disgrace to man and civilization. Could I, as an honest man, remain in the church and wave her bloodstained banner as the emblem of life and joy, and preach and proclaim a doctrin which I was satisfied was entirely untrue? Could I longer lend my voice and my example to perpetuate and extend those things which I was certain were the work of barbarians and designing men instead of God's word? Would my sense of justice and right allow me to laud and praise a book as God's word and impose it upon the ignorant and credulous as such, when I knew it was full of error, fabrications, falsehoods, murder, adultery, incest, and every evil—a book which made God a demon, a fiend, and an ignoramus? These were questions which I frequently asked myself. Fortunately for me, my living and that of my family did not depend upon the church. I was capable of making a living for them by my profession. I am satisfied that very many intelligent ministers of the gospel are prevented from speaking their doubts and openly declaring themselvs Liberals and Freethinkers because of many mouths depending upon them for food, and their life has unfitted them for most other pursuits and callings. Especially is this true of those who hav spent the best part of their lives in the pulpit.

Doubtless many hav asked themselvs, "If I speak out, how shall I make a living?" This problem never disturbed the writer. I do not say that it would not if circumstances could hav been altered. My doubts upon biblical issues were freely communicated to my ministerial brethren. I was wrong. They were amazed at my error. I should not reason; I should believe. I was palpably wrong. I demanded the proof. No proof was necessary to every sane man. The Christ of the gospels was a self-evident fact. I was not satisfied. I wanted proof. They could giv none. They could not giv that which they had not. I was not long in choosing my course. I chose science as my religion, facts as my creed, honest men as my brethren, and Liberalism as my church. I publicly resigned my position in the church, and returned my credentials. There was wailing in Zion.

Once I was a promising young man, honest, sincere, truthful, full of light, love, and truth. Now I am a devil incarnate, a fiend, a foe to humanity, a dangerous character to be avoided as the pestilence, full of deceit. Insane, I should be ostracized socially and otherwise, and but for my reputation professionally I would be. But I care not for their abuse and slander. I am free, yes, thank God, free. My conscience is satisfied. I am obeying the dictates of reason and not following the shadows of blind and ignorant faith.

Mr. Ingersoll's grand lectures did much to emancipate my mind and smite from my hands the manacles of the church and superstition. They should be in the hands of every honest man in or out of the church who is seeking the truth. Any man who is afraid to read, investigate, and think for himself is a slave, and any religion which fears investigation is founded upon a rotten base, a sandy foundation, and rooted in error, in falsehood, and in fable. My thanks are due Mr. Ingersoll, also to Mr. James Bird, of Atlanta, who did much to conduct me from faith to reason, from error to truth. He is a true man, a grand and honest one, one of those men who any one might be proud to know and claim as a friend, a man whose broad and comprehensiv mind is a rich storehouse filled with scientific and Liberal truth, a a man who will certainly leave his mark well defined and positiv upon the science of his time.

If you succeed in raising funds enough to justify you in undertaking that trip, you can call upon me at any time for the promised $5.

Yours for truth, WILLIAM TAYLOR, M.D.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., April 18, 1881.

FATHER BENNETT: Please find one dollar, and giv me credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I won't send you a cent to make you "food for sharks" and Shylocks. No, no, Bennett, that is what the "hellites" want you to do, and they are contributing for that purpose. And some one will follow you to a strange country and "pop" and rob you before you get far enough to see a shark. A hint to the wise is "'nuff."

I will send you $5 for some of your present publications, but to send you out of the country and out of the world, I shall stand aloof and not stain my hands with your blood. But, after all is said and done, if you will go, God bless you (my God, I mean, not the God of the "hellites"). I hope you will hav a pleasant journey and get home to "giv 'em hell" for a long time to come. Fraternally yours, A. H. WALKER.

P. S.—Brother Liberals, don't send our captain to hell! Save him, save him, for we need him much!

A. H. W.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA, April 5, 1881.

DEAR EDITOR: It is with great pleasure I read your valuable family paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I did not know of its existence until about six weeks ago, when I got to reading it in Bro. Quint's. I think, without doubt, it is the best and truest paper to mankind I hav ever read, and wish it every success. Spread the light and let us be a Freethinking nation! My religious training was strictly orthodox; and somehow I could never feel that happiness that the clergy say all true believers ought to hav. They say that all a person has to do is to believe in Jesus Christ, and those that won't do so and pay so much per annum to support the clergy in idleness shall be sent to his imperial majesty, the devil, to be tormented by him at his pleasure for ever and ever. The more I tried to believe in a person or persons I hav never seen, and could find no one who had seen them, the more I doubted. I tried to swallow the whale story, but when I tried to do the same when Moses burnt the golden calf and gave the people the ashes, I threw it up; it was too hard to swallow. My conscience told me it was a lie. If God is such a loving being, who made us after his own likeness, etc., why did he not kill the devil in the first place? But, no; he left his imperial highness to come and tempt us poor innocents, and made a little hole called hell for a kind of penitentiary—Mr. Devil, head boss, with a prospect to come on earth and drag his victims down. Oh, what a loving God! How absurd this Bible reads, contradicting itself every step! Look back at the middle ages! What torture and bloodshed were caused by the Bible! Aye, even look in our police and criminal courts at the present day, and see to what an extent mental torture can be carried on! See the smiling gentlemen torturers, who would be indignant if they heard anything alleged against their gentleness and kindness of heart! There is still the same enjoyment at the distress of their victims as actuated the judges and examiners of the middle ages. The truth is that the savage nature is instinct within us, the only difference being that where the savage eats and roasts his prisoner, the Christians, taught by education, goads and worries his prisoner into madness by a system of browbeating and cross-questioning. THOMAS WALKER.

Rabbi Ishmael.

The Rabbi Ishmael, with the woe and sin,
Of the world heavy upon him, entering in
The Holy of Holies, saw an awful face
With terrible splendor filling all the place.
"O Ishmael Ben Elisha!" said a voice,
"What seekest thou? What blessing is thy choice?"
And, knowing that he stood before the Lord,
Within the shadow of the cherubim
Widewinged between the blinding light and him
He bowed himself, and uttered not a word,
But in the silence of his soul was prayer:
"O thou eternal! I am one of all,
And nothing ask that others may not share.
Thou art almighty; we are weak and small,
And yet thy children: let thy mercy spare!"
Trembling he raised his eyes, and, in the place
Of the insufferable glory, lo! a face
Of more than mortal tenderness, that bent
Graciously down in token of assent.
And, smiling, vanished! With strange joy elate,
The wondering Rabbi sought the temple's gate.
Radiant as Moses from the mount, he stood
And cried aloud unto the multitude;
"O Israel, hear! The Lord our God is good!
Mine eyes hav seen his glory and his grace;
Beyond his judgment shall his love endure;
The mercy of the merciful is sure!"

A Poetical Tribute.

Beautiful sun! Beautiful sun!
Greeting the earth when the day is born;
Smiling as night, like a dark-robed nun,
Enters her cloister at blush of dawn.

Beautiful sun, with your golden beams
Lighting each street and each rosy lane,
Spangling the rills and the mountain streams,
Turning to jewels the drops of rain!

Speeding along as a king might ride,
Scattering benisons here and there;
Causing the evil to skulk and hide,
Making the desolate places fair;

Sending your rays through the open door,
Driving the nightmares far away,
Gilding the boards of the poor man's floor,
Planting the hopes of a new-born day.

Beautiful sun, with your kisses warm
Making the little ones dance for glee;
Soothing and healing the crippled form,
Robbing sad hearts of their misery;

Crowning the heads of the aged pair,
Turning their silvery locks to gold;
Ripening the grain spread out so fair,
Bringing the farmer wealth untold.

Beautiful sun! Beautiful sun!
Speed on your mission from morn till eve;
If you but shine till the goal is won,
Ne'er shall my doubting spirit grieve.

Among Flowers.

CLARK W. BRYAN.

In the garden were leisurely walking
Brave Robin and Roxy the fair,
And Robin, while walking and talking,
Twined roses in Roxy's brown hair;

Rosebuds and roses all blushing,
With sprigs of the sweet mignonette,
While the blood to their faces kept rushing
When Robin's eyes Roxy's eyes met.

Jasmin, laburnum, and larkspur,
Verbenas, deep-dyed and pale;
Gay pansies and white valley lilies
Heard love tell his stammering tale.

While the lovers kept walking and talking,
Four eyes bent down to the ground.
Two hearts had been lost, they discovered,
And then discovered them—found;

But didn't know what to do with them—
The lost and found hearts—for a while;
So each plucked a new and fresh nosegay,
And each gave the other a smile.

Each a stem of forget-me-not gathered,
And each said "Oh, take and keep this;"
Their vows thus exchanged with fresh flowers,
They sealed the exchange—with a kiss.

Fidelity, secrecy, silence,
Each promised to faithfully hold,
Till Robin could earn for his Roxy
A home and some shekels of gold.

But, alas, some open-eared listeners,
Winged messengers hurrying by,
Saw what had been done in the garden,
And tattled to earth and to sky.

"Oh! Robin and Roxy are lovers,"
They piped with a song and a shout,
"And hav plighted their troth in the garden;"
So the delicate secret was out.

The world soon had the whole story,
Which Robin could not deny;
And Roxy, when bantered about it,
Blushed back 'neath a mischievous eye.

So Cupid, and Robin, and Roxy
Made love with flowers for words,
As they walked and talked in the garden,
And nobody told but the birds.

The Minister.

BY HENRY R. SMILEY.

When Christians wish to raise a breeze
And bring poor sinners to their knees,
The minister's their greatest aid—
His talk is all their stock in trade.

When they would shun the sinner's fate,
And all their wicked neighbors hate,
He tells them that God's richest grace
Will surely meet the saddest case.

When for their crooked ways they're blamed,
And of their lives should be ashamed,
He turns their thoughts to other's faults,
And tells them they are all the salts.

And when their funds are getting low,
The sisters will get up a show
To gather aid outside the fold
To screen his back from winter's cold.

He always tells of hell and pains
To scare us out of all our gains;
He'd fill our souls with slavish fear
And make us all like fools appear.

And when he's used us all he wished,
And of all scrip has drained our dish,
He calls our lives all dark and evil,
And kindly sends us to the devil.

He talks of all the joys above
Laid up in store for those that love
To go to church and pay the priest
And on his words their souls to feast.

He always likes to liv around
And feast on food by others found,
To chat with all the pretty girls
And on his fingers twist their curls.

He leads a lazy life of ease
And only uses just his knees;
He of earth's pleasures takes his fill
And says, My Jesus pays the bill.

He's sure to shun all useful labor,
And scorns his honest, toiling neighbor;
And as the patient donkey brays,
So for his bread he daily prays.

And when kind nature interferes
To put a stop to our careers,
He prates of joys and worlds unknown,
And other things beyond his ken.

May all my friends who read these lines,
For whom the light of reason shines,
Ponder them well and then decide
If I hav told the truth or lied.

And now, kind friends, my verse is done,
So I will wish you, every one,
A happy life, a peaceful end,
And only add a warm Amen!

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo. 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly edncated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your conntry and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection toall classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above qnotation, to be fonnd in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelons results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people ook up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES!"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the lunocence of drugging? Even where the patieuts are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as loug as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DET. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results dne to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given np to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like causc, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
81 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thercupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelons testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth strect, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENT AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

CHRISTIANS believe themselvs to be the aristocracy of heaven upon earth; they are admitted to the spiritual court, while millions of men in foreign lands hav never been presented. They bow their knees and say that they are "miserable sinners," and their hearts rankle with abominable pride. Poor, infatuated fools! Their servility is real and their insolence is real, but their king is a phantom and their palace is a dream.—Winwood Reade.

MAN'S intellect has penetrated the skies; he alone comprehends the risings and settings of the stars, and watches their courses; he notes the days, months, and years as they elapse; he calculates the eclipses of the sun and moon, predicts them long before they happen, and determins exactly their extents, their periods, and their durations. Nothing seems wanting to his intelligence except immortality: but this circumstance is not necessary for his enjoying satisfaction during his life.—Cicero.

Giv thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned thought his act;
Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
. . . . . .
Giv every man thine ear, but few thy voice:
Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
. . . . . .
This above all—to thine ownself be true;
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
—Shakspere.

To a person uninstructed in natural history, his country walk or seaside stroll is a walk through a gallery filled with wonderful works of art, nine-tenths of which hav their faces turned to the wall. Teach him something of natural history, and you place in his hands a catalog of those worth turning round. Surely our innocent pleasures are not so abundant in this life that we can afford to despise this or any other source of them. We should fear being banished for our neglect to that limbo where the great Florentine tells us are those who, during this life, "wept when they might be joyful."—Huxley.

OH, Tullochgorum's my delight,
It gass [makes] us a' in ane unite;
And any sumph [dull fool] that keeps up spite
In conscience I abhor him;
For blythe and merry we'll be a',
Blythe and merry, blythe and merry,
Blythe and merry we'll be a',
And make a cheerful quorum;
As long as we hae breath to draw
And dance till we be like to fa'
The reel o' Tullochgorum.
—John Skinner.

O THOU who in the heavens doth dwell,
Who, as it pleases best thysel',
Send ane to heaven and ten to hell,
A' for thy glory;
And not for any good or ill,
They've done afore thee!
I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou hast left in night,
That I am here afore thy sight,
For gifts an' grace,
A burnin' and a shinin' light,
To a' this place. —Burns.

I RESENT as an arrogant assumption the habitual practice of refusing the name of Christian to all who shrink away or assail the errors and corruptions with which its official defenders hav overlaid the faith of Christ. And I can find no words of adequate condemnation for the shallow insolence of men who are not ashamed to fling the name of "Atheist" on all whose conceptions of the deity are purer, loftier, more Christian than their own. Those who dare to dogmatize about God's nature and purposes prove by that very daring their hopeless incapacity even to grasp the skirts or comprehend the conditions of that mighty problem.—W. R. Greg.

LET any one look back upon his past career—look inward on his daily life—and then say what effect would be produced upon him were the conviction once fixedly imbedded in his soul that everything done is done irrevocably—that even the omnipotence of God cannot uncommit a deed—cannot make that undone which has been done; that every act must bear its allotted fruit according to the everlasting laws—must remain forever ineffaceably inscribed on the tablets of universal nature. And then let him consider what would hav been the result upon the moral condition of our race had all men ever (i. e., at all times) held this conviction.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

IN many respects the best characters of our day are far below those of the immortal Stoics, whose God-like aspirations and energies were kept in play by the holiest of all motivs, "to preserve the dignity of human nature from shipwreck." The dying Antoninus Pius, serene in the midst of the anger of priests and the din of battle, shines at this distance like the hills of heaven in the rosy light of evening. Beside that display of antique grandeur what is the agony of the luxurious Christian, fearing that he has not faith enough to save him—a mistaken Calvin, leaning on Christ over the smoke of the roasting Servetus, or religious ecstacies of John Newton on his own slave ship, where eight smothered wretches were daily thrown into the sea?—Alhaza.

FEW things hav hurt me more in life than the unjust tyranny of parents and teachers over the little ones under their care. Most of this is due to ignorance; to spare the rod has been said to be to spoil the child. But we should be wiser than our fathers, and consequently be able to do better and more loving work. Hav patience, then, with the troublesome little ones, O my brothers and sisters! Remember the noisiest and busiest child, the one most often in mischief, has really the best materials in him for the making of a strong, great, and forcible man; one who will make a mark in the world if he has the proper start, environments, and surroundings. Whereas if improperly trained and mismanaged he has equal capacities for causing great evils and committing bad crimes.—Elmina D. Slenker.

A ROMANCE OF OUR OWN DAY.

CHAPTER I.

Pitou was in trouble. His cheek was wan and his eye lusterless. He bit his moustachois nervously and gazed abstractedly out of the shop window. The sun was shining. The birds twittered merrily in the trees. The human tide poured down the the street, some laughing, all happy. But Pitou was sad. Nobody came to do business with him.

Nanine entered. She was Pitou's daughter. She was also sad. There were traces of tears about her.

"Where are you going, my child?" asked Pitou.

"Nowhere, papa," replied Nanine: "I am waiting."

"Waiting? And for whom?" inquired Pitou.

"Jacques," answered Nanine.

"Ah!" said Pitou.

CHAPTER II.

Jacques was Nanine's lover. He was also in love with Julie, the daughter of Pierre. Jacques was a pleasant gentleman, but he was poor. He was ambitious to link his destiny with a madamoiselle of financial ability.

Jacques stalked gloomily down the boulevard. He intended to visit Nanine, but Pitou's shop wore a deserted appearance. The people passed it by and surged in great swelling billows into Pierre's shop. Jacques was quick to detect this. He was a man of the world. "Mon Dieu! I hav had a narrow escape," he said to himself as he passed Pitou's door and entered that of Pierre.

CHAPTER III.

"You hav come," exclaimed Julie, as Jacques clasped her to his bosom.

"And you love me?" asked Jacques, giving a hasty glance at the crowd of patrons in the shop.

Ere she could reply, Pitou and Nanine stood in their presence.

"Monsieur, you are a rascal!" said Pitou. "You hav broken my Nanine's heart."

"No, Monsieur," said Jacques, "it is you who hav done this. Look around you. This is Pierre's shop. All is thrift and prosperity. Wealth pours in. Customers come leagues to buy of Pierre. Return to your own shop and look around you. You see deserted space, goods unsold, and bankruptcy staring you in the face. Is it not so?"

"Monseur is right," said Pitou, bowing his head.

"Leave me with Julie," said Jacques. "Go back to your shop. Advertise in the daily papers as Pierre has done, and you may yet prosper, and Nanine may yet find a husband."

CHAPTER IV.

Pitou went. Next morning he had a double half column in the Times. That week he sold sixty thousand francs' worth of dry goods, and bought a corner lot in Mulkey's addition. In two months Nanine married a plumber, and now lives in a palatial residence, and is the happy mother of twins.

"Ah," says Pitou softly, "I did well to follow Jacques's advice."

Pitou's head is level. Well, yes. We should smile.—Kansas City Times.

Notes and Clippings.

SENATOR CONKLING has for years been accustomed to speak of the late acting President as Rather-fraud B. Hayes.

BEBEL, a member of the German Reichstag, says that "the German people hav now only one want, and that is for money enough to get to America."

THE indictment against Mrs. Fletcher, who was convicted in London the other day of obtaining money by false pretenses, was a truly appalling document, being over one hundred feet in length.

THE pastors of Cincinnati are besought by the Enquirer not to go off on long vacations next summer, leaving the people unprotected against the devil at a season when vital piety is most needed to offset the high temperature.

THE Rev. Mr. Vandeburg, of Springfield, Ill., has a bad-tempered wife. Becoming enraged at him, she cut his Sunday coat, vest, and shirt into shreds, and then tried to further use the knife on his body. He concluded that forbearance would no longer be a virtue, and had her arrested.

THERE is no law in Illinois legalizing any kind of woman suffrage; but at Rockford separate ballot boxes were provided by the City Council for women to vote, merely as an expression of their opinion, on the question of liquor license or prohibition. They gave a majority of three to one for prohibition.

A MUSCULAR female Christian has been arrested in Portland for cruelly treating a three-years-old child because he would not say his prayers. What a cheerful idea of religion that youngster will hav when he is able to hav ideas at all, unless, indeed, he has been Christianized into his grave before that time comes!

FOUR poor Philadelphia housewives joined in the purchase of a whole barrel of flour, and found it considerably cheaper than their previous practice of buying a few pounds at a time. They extended the plan to other supplies, and then to additional members. Next they hired a room and a woman to superintend the purchase and distribution. Fifty families now get all their groceries through this association at the lowest wholesale prices.

FRANK D. MOORE, a lawyer of Covington, Ky., went into the Presbyterian ministry, and was for a number of years pastor of a church in the city where he had practiced law. A year ago he preached two sermons against the sanctity of the Sabbath, declaring that Sunday ought to be a day of rest and recreation. His Presbytery requested him to reconsider the question. He has done so, and now declares that he is unchanged in opinion. He has been deposed.

THE Supreme Court of New Hampshire has decided that there is nothing in the Constitution of that state to hinder the taxation of church property. The contrary view has long been held, but the court says: "An exemption not founded on a grant in the Constitution or on any contract in any charter or legislativ act is not prescriptivly established by enjoyment, however long continued. We decide that the Constitution does not exempt church property from taxation."

THE Rev. R. H. Smith, a Methodist, of British Columbia, refrained for many years from preaching the doctrin of eternal punishment. Being at last driven to a statement of his views on that subject, he declared that he no longer believed that God would ever torture any human being. He has left the Methodist church, of course, and nearly his entire congregation hav gone with him. At Simpsonville, Ky., a pastor was equally successful in leading his people to accompany him in a change of creed, but in this case the change was from Unitarianism to Presbyterianism.

AMONG the worshipers at a church in London, Ontario, was a man who groaned. This was for a while taken as evidence of devoutness, but eventually it became a nuisance, and he was requested to be less noisy or stay away from the meetings. He would take neither course, and was therefore arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace. He regards himself as a Christian martyr, and will not giv bail, preferring to languish in jail until his trial. What kind of a country is it when a man cannot groan out his praises as well as to sing them or shout them?

THE Adventists used to hold that, in view of the early end of the world, church organization was improper. In 1845 a simple declaration of their belief in the second coming of Christ was formulated. The Second Advent Christian Association, which is the principal Advent body, has just held a convention at Worcester, Mass., and on this occasion a fuller statement of principles was adopted. The peculiar points are that the finally impenitent will be destroyed, that the coming of Christ is near at hand, and that the earth will be made over for the future abode of saints.

THE latest statistics show 41,678,000 school children in the world, so far as the census takers were enabled to ascertain. These hav about 1,000,000 teachers. First in proportion to population comes the United States, with 9,373,195 pupils and 271,144 teachers. Both here and in France the school children form one-fifth of the population. Prussia, with 4,007,776 pupils and 57,936 teachers, takes the third place. Next come England and Wales, where, as in Prussia, school children are one-sixth of the population. Austria then flies into line. In Japan there are 2,162,962 school children, but the total population is not known.

THERE is a body of believers in modern miracles at Seaforth, Canada. The members use what they call sacred oil in addition to prayer in curing sick persons. A man who had almost been persuaded to join them fell ill, and thought he was going to die. He promised that, if their oil and prayers saved him, he would surely unite with their church. While they were ministering to him a surgeon performed an operation on the patient. He improved at once, and in a few days was well. The question is, What cured him? He says the surgeon did it, but the miracle people claim the credit, and hav passed a resolution accusing him of repudiating his promis of conversion.

DURING six years' excavation at Olympia, under the auspices of the German government, the following sculptures and architectural works hav been brought to light: 1. About 180 statues in a very variable state of preservation, groups, reliefs, busts, etc., etc., among them the Hermes of Praxiteles, the Nike of Paionios, the groups from the temple of Zeus, the pediment of the treasury of Megara, etc.; 2. 1,500 fragments, belonging to the statues, etc., just mentioned; 3. 400 inscriptions and 600 fragments of lines; 4. More than 14,000 art objects of copper; 5. About 4,000 of clay; 6. About forty buildings or foundations of buildings; 7. 6,000 coins; and 8. A smaller number of pieces of iron, lead, glass, etc.

IS CHRISTIANITY FLOURISHING?—Among the churches of the interior and the West the question is answering itself. The logic of events leaves only one reply. We hav hundreds of churches, the membership of each of which is not more than two or three dozen. We hav not far from a score in which, when the brotherhood vote, there is always a unanimity. For the brotherhood numbers precisely—one. In our churches, generally, the female membership is double, if not triple or quadruple, the male. And often each woman is worth two of the men. To suppress the sisterhood in such a church and depend on the brethren—or the brother—to sustain the prayer-meeting would be like leaving the organ bellows idle and expecting the rattling of the keys to make the music.—Advance.

THAT portion of the Canton (Ohio) Methodist congregation which accepted the doctrin of perfect holiness or sanctification maintained a kind of separate organization, holding prayer-meetings by themselvs, and electing their own leader. Pastor Jones announced that he would conduct those meetings himself, and attended one for that purpose, but the sanctified all stayed away. He retaliated by erasing the names of two of them from the register, and forbidding the holding of holiness meetings in the church. Elder Ault retorted that the pastor had better take the gold studs out of his shirt before dictating to true Methodists. The pastor ordered him to be put out, and Ault defied any of the brethren to undertake the job. An aged sister called for a millstone to tie to the clergyman's neck before casting him into the sea, and the meeting ended riotously.

PROCTOR KNOTT has demonstrated very clearly that his reputation as a story-teller is not entirely undeserved. One of the best stories he relates is how a young colored lad got the start of him in a religious matter. There was some sort of celebration in honor of St. Francis de Xavier, which he attended. A host of negroes in his neighborhood were Roman Catholics. When he came home this darkey boy asked him how he liked the Catholic service. "I," he said, "could not stand it." He said, "There was one point about it that I never liked." "What is that?" said the boy. "The priest does all his praying in Latin." At this the colored boy fell down in the road and rolled over, shouting with laughter. "Why, what is the matter with you?" said Knott. The darkey answered, "Fo' God, massa, don't think that de Lord can't understand de Latin as well as English. In the Catholic church de priest he prays to de Lord, and not to de congregation;" and Mr. Knott added that he had been brought up in a church where the preacher prayed to the congregation, and acknowledged that the boy had got the advantage of him.

A WELLSBORO, Pa., correspondent sends in an account of a pious and leading brother of the Baptist church noted for his zeal in the Sunday-school cause and for his loud and zealous prayers, who owns a magic lantern, and who occasionally visits neighboring small towns and delivers lectures of a religious character, accompanied with his stereopticon views. Not long since this pious Dr. E. (for, be it known, he was a dentist), visited Shippin township to exhibit his views of the Holy Land, and to tell his audience about that famous country. To encourage a full attendance to his pious show he had offered a reward of two dollars to the boy who would sell the greatest number of tickets. Several boys and girls spent a number of days in canvassing the country to sell tickets for the Doctor's entertainment. One little boy excelled all the rest. He had spent a week in tramping over the country; two dollars was a large sum of money to him, and he made earnest exertions to obtain it. He sold thirteen tickets. After the moral exhibition was over, the doctor requested the little boy to stop till after the audience had left. The lad's happy hour had come; he was about to receive the reward for his week of toil. The pious doctor called the lad to him and said, "Open your mouth." The child knew nought but to obey. After taking a hurried look at the boy's teeth, he whisked out his forceps and took two of them out in a dextrous manner. "There," said he, "my son, that is your premium for selling tickets. My price for pulling teeth is one dollar each; the two amount to two dollars, so that settles the bill." The little boy was sorely disappointed. He saw the vision of his two dollars take flight, and he had an aching jaw instead. He could not quite see that he had been paid for his week's labor. The next time the pious doctor visits that locality the children will hardly be likely to work selling tickets for him.

George Eliot.

This distinguished woman has, I fear, gone down to the grave without giving to the world the reasons in detail which justified her, in the forum of her own conscience, in sustaining love relations with Mr. Lewes which were not authorized, but forbidden with penalties, by the laws of England. Believing, as she thoroughly did, in the sanctity of the affections, and in the divine marriage of one man with one woman, she seemed to despise the legal institution of that name, and did not regard it as binding upon her. Living and dying, she maintained her own sovereignty over her own person. But when she made up her mind to do so, and especially when she found by experience that it was the secret of happy and permanent marriage, her high position in society as a thinker and author entitled the world to know from her own pen, sooner or later, what reasons influenced her in thus jeopardizing her reputation by putting seeming contempt on the marriage laws of her country. This being so serious a matter, I always believed that before she died, or in some posthumous work, she would explain this enigma of her character, so as not only to justify herself, but to offer an argument which others could use, whose sentiments and course of life were like her own. When a common person violates the law he is convicted and punished, or, if he be very degraded and of no account, his transgression is ignored. But when a woman distinguished for her ability, and for the general excellence of her moral character, tramples under foot a statute which is deemed all-important to the best interests of society, she has no moral right to, by her silence, keep the public ignorant of her motivs. It looks like a secret consciousness of ill-doing, which was not the fact in this case.

Marian Evans no doubt regarded the legal institution of marriage as a barbarism, because, without the least regard to the tenderness and delicacy of the personal relations set up by the holy sentiment of love, it halters a man and woman together like brutes, only caring to make them responsible for any child that may be born. The English code is more faulty than ours. It makes the husband the owner, and the wife his property. It is fully expressed by Petruchio, in "The Taming of the Shrew," where he says of Kate, his newly-married wife:

> "I will be master of what is mine own:
> She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house,
> My household stuff, my field, my barn,
> My horse, my ox, my ass, my anything:
> And here she stands, touch her whoever dare."

That this quotation expresses the essential idea in the legal institution of marriage is shown by the way the English law acts in cases of divorce. If a wife of the highest intelligence differs, in her metaphysical ideas about God, from her lord and master, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a divorce is the consequence, the law tears away the child from its mother with as little compunction of conscience as the butcher takes the calf from its dam. It is not exaggeration to pronounce such laws barbarous; and if it were not for the fact that all people are better than either their laws or their religion, no intelligent and self-respecting woman would ever giv her own consent to place her in such a condition of liability as an English, or even an American, wife is exposed to by the law.

The marriage laws of this country are like the revenue laws—binding upon the acts of a person, but not upon his conscience. If I cross the line into Canada, and purchase a web of cloth to make garments for my children, because I can get it cheaper there than here, I pay the duty at the custom-house for the sake of expediency, but not for the same reason that makes me pay the merchant from whom I purchased the article. He gave me for my money a quid pro quo. But I pay the duty for the same reason I would giv my purse to a highwayman who says, "Deliver or die!" Indeed the idea is preposterous that a body of stupid and immoral men called a legislature could pass a law that should bind the conscience of one who is so far advanced in civilization as to be a law unto himself, simply because it was the will of the majority. A rogue, once, in a state where divorces were decreed by the legislature, for a joke smuggled into a divorce bill the names of a couple who had been remarkable, during their married life of forty years, for the strength of their mutual attachment. In a few days they read in the newspapers that they were divorced by act of the assembly, and were no longer husband and wife. The same legislature had previously declared, and it was now the law, that if two unmarried persons of different sexes were seen in bed with each other it was evidence of adultery, and they were liable to be sent to the penitentiary. But the divorced couple aforesaid treated the solemn, authoritativ decree of the legislature divorcing them just as Marian Evans treated the laws of England regarding marriage, with contempt. However, as they were not now legally husband and wife, but only really so, this loving pair had to go through the solemn nonsense of being "married" over again.

If I were a woman contemplating marriage I would never giv up the sovereignty over my own person to any man. He would be worse than a brute to ask it, and I would be worse than a fool to yield it. If a woman does not own her own person by a title which nature givs and makes inalienable, what under heaven does she own in the way of rights? And as for various causes marriage is a risk, and as in case of failure to obtain its object the woman suffers more than the man, she ought, when the chain of legal marriage is put round her neck and locked, to hold the key in her own hand so as to be relieved of the burden when, after sad and sufficient trial, she feels it to be such.

The Supreme Court of the United States has, by a final decision, declared that in this country where courts do not act pro salute animæ, because they do not know whether a man has any soul or not, marriage is simply a civil contract. And as it is of the essence of such a contract that the parties can annul it for cause, I would, if a wife, hold the courts to that principle, and if my husband undertook to fall back on the doctrin of the law and of Petruchio, and treat me as his property instead of his sweetheart, I should consider myself released by his violation of the agreement and resume my original status as my father's daughter and take my original name.

After half a century's observation of the working of the law, and with the history of the world before me, I am inclined to believe that if the legal institution of marriage were done away entirely, and men and women were allowed to manage their love relations to suit themselvs, always having regard to the educational and property rights of the children that might be born, there would be more loving, permanent marriages than there are now. Marian Evans was at liberty to leave Mr. Lewes, and he to leave her at any moment when they deliberately concluded it was best for both parties to revoke and annul their article of agreement. But their hearts were welded together in as true a marriage as was ever solemnized by pope, archbishop, or civil magistrate. Paradoxical as it may seem to those who hav never studied the subject, and productiv of a yelp from those scurvy dogs which bay upon the track of every true reformer, the very freedom of their relations was a guarantee for the permanence of their love and happiness. But as this is a vital point, let me elaborate it for a moment.

All writers on political liberty admit, what Macaulay in his Edinburgh Review article on "Milton" shows, that the cure for all the evils which newly-acquired freedom produces is freedom. A prisoner who has been living in a dungeon for twenty years if brought out into the light of day cannot endure the rays of the sun beating down upon his eye-balls, neither can he distinguish colors. But the remedy for his blindness is not to send him back to his gloomy cell, but to accustom him to the light, and in a little while his eyes recover the power of vision. It has always been a plausible doctrin of the privileged and conservativ few that the masses of the people ought not to be free till they are first fit for their freedom. But this maxim is worthy of the fool whose tender regard for his own safety from drowning would not allow him to venture into the water till he had first learned to swim. The truth is that there is a principle of reaction in human affairs like the alternate motions of a pendulum, and liberty cures its own evils. It is, therefore, safer in the long run for a people to be free than to be enslaved. The present condition of the United States and France, the only two great republics in the world, justifies this remark. The people of these countries hav secured to themselvs, by law and constitution, a fuller measure of political liberty than that enjoyed by any other nation, and hence they are the happiest, most peaceable, and most prosperous people on earth. When a people are entirely free, the laws and policy of the government being an expression of their own will, and subject to their own modification or repeal, all cause of revolt is extinguished and the blessings of peace and contentment abound. It was the fatal blunder of Mirabeau, in the French Revolution, that, after kissing the hand of the queen, he lost his political foresight and did not see that the success of the revolution and the avoidance of unnecessary bloodshed depended upon the natural flow of the revolutionary waters till the Augean stable of despotism was thoroughly cleansed. He ate back his own words, retraced his own steps, and tried again the policy of damming up the waters, and we know how it ended.

Now, if complete political freedom is found to be safest and best for all the members of the commonwealth wherever it has been intelligently and faithfully tried, why would not entire social freedom secure peace and happiness in the conjugal relation of the sexes? When a home is made joyful by the cry of a new-born babe you do not swear the mother and put her under bonds to feed and clothe the little stranger before she is allowed to kiss it. You leave her perfectly free to follow out the promptings of her maternal nature without any supervision of the law because you know that as a general rule, with very few exceptions, it is safe to trust a mother's love. Then why fasten a man and woman together in marriage with a chain of wrought-iron links instead of trusting the noble sentiment of love that brought them into this relation, and which so wonderfully develops true manhood and womanhood? Man's love for woman is the primal instinct, and is just as holy, just as self-sacrificing, and just as strong as the maternal instinct which it has been the means of calling into action. You say if husbands and wives are not chained together by the marriage laws the tie of love, when strained by provocation, will snap, and they will take advantage of their freedom and run away from each other. Then, I say, they ought to run away from each other. To liv together in the marital relation when love has turned into hate is prostitution, and perhaps rape, and none the less so because it is legalized. They hav no moral right to bring children into existence under circumstances which, by the laws of heredity, would make them criminals, or imbecil in mind and body, so that they cannot support themselvs in after life. In Ohio, a state better adapted from its soil and climate than any other in the Union to hav a happy population, the tax-payers hav erected at Columbus the largest pile of bricks and mortar in the country, and it is only one of two or three others of the same kind, devoted to the unfortunates who hav been made such mainly in consequence of their having been born of unloving and inharmonious parents, who stamped them as counterfeit human beings in their mothers' wombs. It is a great evil, I admit, for husbands and wives to separate, but it is a far greater evil for them to liv together and beget children of lust and prostitution instead of love. If they hav cursed themselvs by blundering into marital relations for which they were not fitted, they hav no right, and it is a crime against society, to send out from their breeding-places, improperly called homes, a lot of misbegotten imps to perpetuate themselvs as criminals, paupers, or imbecils from generation to generation.

But perhaps, reader, you roll up the whites of your eyes in holy horror and charge me with advocating the social heresy of "Freelove." I do indeed advocate free, unrestrained liberty in marriage, as I advocate free and unrestrained political liberty in the state. I believe in free love, but not in "Freelove." That is to say, I am in favor of my definition of the term, but not of yours. You mean by that word the promiscuous whoredom that drives the plowshare of ruin through marriage and the family so that no child could hav a home or suspect who his parents were. I mean by it the very opposit of all this. I believe the state is made up of its families, and that for home and dynastic purposes the loving union of one man and one woman is indispensable, and that to secure the permanency of the love which brought them into this holy relation and to make divorce unthought of and impossible the parties must be free to dissolve their voluntary contract when it is found, after painful experience, that it does not and cannot answer the end in view at the time it was made. As I hav already said, in alluding to the case of Marian Evans, it is the consciousness that each party holds the other by the tie of love alone that givs the strongest assurance of the happiness and permanency of the marriage relation. When will we cease to slander human nature by saying that in the tenderest, the strongest, and the holiest of all relations love is not to be trusted with liberty, but must be loaded down with the chains of bondage! Nature declares for the safety of free marriage. The wild horse on the pampas of South America selects his partners in love and confines his attentions exclusivly to them. He never mixes his blood with his own fillies, but when they mature drives them away to other herds to seek lovers who are not related to them in blood. It is only when captured and reduced to bondage by domestication that he comes from under the sway of the delicate instincts of his nature and becomes willing to commit incest. Loud as the fools may talk, and terrible as their vaticinations of the ruinous consequences of free marriage may be, I believe that the average American is as intelligent and as decent as a wild horse, and would behave himself as well in the character of a lover, provided he understood the subject and his natural instincts were not perverted by the false doctrin that he was born totally depraved and ought not to be trusted.

If a decree were made by the legislature of Ohio divorcing on a fixed day in the near future all the married couples in the state, it would no doubt produce what the old geologists used to call a cataclysm. There would be a chaos in the marital relations. Those who had been living in legal constraint, like a cat and dog tied together, and cursing mutually the day that made them husband and wife, would not, and ought not to, return to bondage. But after the shock was over, the divine goddess Nature would begin the work of constructing society anew, and true marriage would take place. Till the principle of reaction adjusted things, as the law of gravitation calms down the waves of the sea when the storm is over, there would probably be here and there excesses of liberty, but the cure for them would be continued freedom, not a return to the old bondage. After a while, men and women would come to understand the true nature of love and marriage, and experience would show that freedom is as safe in social as it is in political life. The object we all hav in view is the same. We all wish to see marriage a loving and indissoluble relation, wherein the parties, dwelling under their own roof, make home the dearest spot on all the earth for themselvs and their children. The only question is, How can such marriages be best brought about? Is it by yoking a man and woman together as you do oxen, letting them in case of mutual disgust pull away from each other till the yoke breaks and sets them free? Or, will you make marriage a voluntary contract, repealable for cause at the option of the parties themselvs, thus putting them constantly on their good behavior, continuing the days of courtship and of love all through married life, and making home the permament abode of peace and happiness? We hav tried ninth-century ideas of love and marriage for nearly a thousand years and find them a failure. Suppose we now try nineteenth-century ideas, and giv freedom a chance to show her divine origin by making marriage a divine institution.

At the risk of being considered prolix I must quote a passage of history in verification, as far as it goes, of this theory of free marriage. In the February number of Harper's monthly Magazine, published some years since, is an article entitled, "The Life of an Eastern Woman," from which it appears that in some countries of the East a custom prevails of lovers living together for a limited period of one or two years to see whether they are adapted to each other; and if, after experience, they find that the temporary relation is an agreeable one, promising future happiness, they take upon themselvs the obligations of permanent marriage; if otherwise, the partnership is dissolved. Toward the conclusion of the article, the author in describing this custom remarks, "It is a curious illustration of human nature that these temporary arrangements usually result in permanent ones, the very liberty of withdrawal seeming to make the matrimonial yoke less heavy to bear."

The legal institution of marriage with its bondage, its quarrelings and its divorces, in contradistiction to the divine, free marriage I advocate, was a feudal arrangement, gotten up in those dark ages of ignorance and brutality, solely to regulate by law the descent of property. Mutual love, the honor of woman, and the sanctity of her person, the birth and education of good children, chastity in either sex, were ideas that never entered the heads of our benighted ancestors when the law of marriage was enacted. During the reign of feudalism in England and Scotland there was a law, or custom equivalent to law, called Borough-English, giving to the feudal lord the right of concubinage with the vassal's wife on her wedding night; and hence the law of primogeniture, which gave the estate to the the eldest son, was set aside in such cases, because of the extreme likelihood that the first-born child, and perhaps the second, was begotton by the lord instead of the vassal himself. That there was any sanctity in the marriage institution itself, that there was anything wrong or indecent in such a custom, never was dreamed of in those barbarous times. The legal wife was merely an instrument of lust, and the method of providing the owner of land and other property with an heir to enjoy his father's estate when he died. There were cases, no doubt, of love, and a right conception of the holiness of the relation, for nature is always stronger than law. But what I assert is that the marriage law itself had no regard whatever for the rights or honor of woman, but was a simple expedient to settle the question of heirship to property. Chastity and faithfulness to her husband in marriage were deemed virtues, not because they were beautiful adornments in a woman's character, in themselvs considered, but because adultery endangered the transmission of her husband's property to heirs of his own begetting. Property, property, property, this was the aim of every man in those medieval times, for property, and not knowledge as now, was power. It obtruded itself into the marriage ritual on the wedding day, and first and foremost made the bridegroom say, as an inducement to the bride to submit to her degrading condition as a wife, "With all my lands and tenements I thee endow," so that in case of widowhood she could hav her dower. The whole law regarding woman was wooden from beginning to end; it was iron; it was diabolical; it looked after, and regarded as valuable, only materialistic things. It punished, and still punishes, the crime of seduction only by allowing the father of a seduced daughter to bring suit against her betrayer to recover the value of her menial services during the time she may be engrossed by the cares of motherhood. It cared nothing for the sacredness of her person, her wounded honor and confidence, and her blighted hopes, all violated in the holy name of love. The question in law was, How much of the daughter's service did the father lose by the outrage?

But as century after century rolled by, and the old barbarism gave way a little, love began to claim her rights as the first-born and holiest of the instincts in human nature. And I am strongly inclined to believe that if love were studied and understood by statesmen and legislators as one of the mightiest and most conservativ forces in civilization, and were allowed to manage its own affairs without the hindrance of the law, it would prove its divine character by its divine tendency to bless society in all its diversified interests.

Mrs. Jones, at my elbow, suggests that while such a free marriage as the one I advocate was the very ordinance of God for Marian Evans and George Lewes, who were highly cultivated and moral persons, it would not do for the commonalty. Most women, it is alleged, think that it is the beauty of their persons which attracts their lovers, and they are afraid that the love may be as ephemeral as the beauty, and therefore they feel anxious, in view of the fading character of their personal charms, that their lovers should be bound to them by the indenture of a legal marriage. But, in the name of heaven, I ask, if those two persons could illustrate the happiness and permanence of divine and free marriage, why could not others, equally good, do so too? They were no more and no less than human beings, like the rest of us, and what they were capable of the rest of us can attain to when our environments are favorable. The peculiarity in their case was that they had studied, and therefore fully understood, the whole subject of love and marriage before they entered into their new relations. From all accounts they were both personally homely. But they well knew that platonic love was the only true basis of personal love, and hence the beautiful superstructure they built upon it defied all contingencies, for we know that when we admire and prize the jewel in the casket it is not hard to lose the casket itself. And if by a long experience, in defiance of law, and in the absence of personal attractivness, they found out the secret of happy marriage, they ought to hav revealed it before they died to suffering humanity. This marriage question is the problem of the ages yet unsolved. Society has a right to knowledge on this subject from those who know how to think. And this is why I feel that it was cowardly and cruel in Marian Evans to go to her grave without giving the world the reasons she had for seeming to put contempt upon the legal institution of marriage, while she evidently felt that true love had another and a better way of it.

Does Death End All?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Sir: This subject has been and is being treated with considerable ability in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but yet the subject is left just where it was found. As the question has never yet been answered, must the inference be that it never will? It is too interesting a question to be despairingly dropped for good and unanswered. My opinion is that in the near future the problem will be solved.

So far as logical reasoning alone goes, the Materialist and Positivist are ahead of the Spiritualist and orthodoxy. Indeed the latter one may as well be put out of the controversy on such a theme. Orthodoxy has blundered so much on cosmic facts that its opinion on this point is not respectable. Therefore the Spiritualist alone is the only modern advocate of the idea of a future existence. This short article is not to argue, but is only a passing comment. The foundation facts of the Materialist are solid, sure, and so far as mere argument goes, seem convincing and unanswerable.

But with all the accumulated centuries of knowledge, we are but on the threshold. Our future discoveries will be in increased ratio as compared to the past. The Materialist and Positivist giv the seemingly very probable theory that "death ends all." The Spiritualist produces phenomena which he claims prove a continued existence after (so-called) death. The Materialist either refuses to investigate his opponent's claim, or else, if he does investigate, he admits there are are phenomena that his science or his logic is unable to account for.

Not as a Materialist, nor as a Spiritualist, but merely as a "truth seeker," I mention a few facts witnessed by me. Brown, of Red Oak, Iowa, reads the thoughts of a person by taking hold of his hand. one present, not a confederate, thinks of some some familiar countenance in a crowd, without so much as looking in the direction of the person thought of, and Brown picks him or her out among 300 or more. He makes the common-place rappings, table-movings, etc., but scouts the idea of another world and spirits. But can the Materialist explain these items? "Oh, yes!" he says, "it is owing to electricity." Almost as well might he say, "It is owing to the moon." The late E. V. Wilson would pick out different persons from a large audience, and tell them prominent remarkable incidents of their lives, too specific to be by chance. "Owing to electricity," again, I suppose. At Mott's, in Missouri, I saw the form of one long since dead, and it conversed intelligently in a manner that none but the departed could hav done when living. Will "electricity" account for this last? "No," says the Materialist, "but he fooled you." Then also was I fooled by Brown and Wilson. Then am I fooled when I sit down to dinner and fancy I am dining. Then twelve or fifteen at Mott's were also fooled. Then thousands ever increasing in number are fooled, and Pope's "Dunciad," will do better now than then.

Scientists investigate the constituents of matter called atoms. They define protoplasm, but they ignore too much the Spiritualistic phenomena. Science should not rest satisfied with ridicule alone as a test of any truth, for doubtless there is much truth mixed with much error in modern Spiritualism.

Obituary.

Very few among Hervey Evans's host of intimate friends and acquaintances will experience any surprise at the intelligence of his demise, as all hav for a long time been aware of the fact, as he himself was, that he could not last very long. He passed away after many months, and in fact, years, of severe suffering, at the age of forty-six years. When the war broke out Mr. Evans enlisted, and during the service contracted a disease from which he never recovered, and which for the last two years has kept him confined to his room nearly all of the time. But he was a brave, courageous man, and bore up under his painful affliction like a true soldier. In belief he was a Freethinker, and in all his dealings with men he recognized, as the chief principles of life, honesty and charity. It can be said of him, which is a great deal more than can be said of most human beings, that he was a generous and charitable neighbor, a kind husband and father, and an honest man. While living he always did all in his power for the diffusion of knowledge, and feeling that death was approaching him he voluntarily declared that if after his death scientific men thought that his remains would be of any benefit to science he was willing that they should do with them as they saw proper. As his illness had been one of a rather extraordinary nature, Drs. Tefft, Waste, Roberts, and Davis held a post mortem examination over his remains. The funeral took place at the residence and was largely attended. It was conducted strictly according to his requests, which were explained by Dr. N. S. Tefft in a few brief remarks. After all the preparations had been accomplished an appropriate hymn was sung, after which the Doctor spoke in substance as follows:

Before Hervey Evans died he requested me to see that proper arrangements were made for his funeral, and said he wished to leave explicit instructions with regard to it. In the first place he desired that after everything had been properly arranged, and his friends and neighbors had been permitted to see him, his body should be taken to the burial ground and deposited in the grave in as quiet a manner as possible. To carry out this idea he selected his own pall-bearers, and desired me to say at least this much: that under no circumstances did he want any preaching or praying over his dead body; he did not even want a lecture of any length; that he expected to die as he had lived; that he did not believe in the pagan or Christian religion; that he did not accuse any being in the universe of bringing upon him the disease with which he had suffered so many years, and which would bring him to the grave; that when the war broke out he did not believe it could be stopped by asking God to defeat the enemy, but shouldered his gun and went into the field himself, and that while at his post of duty he contracted a disease with which he suffered so many days, weeks, months, and even long years; and for the last six years no time more than sixty consecutiv minutes hav passed, night or day, but what he has been obliged to make physical effort to relieve himself of excruciating pain. At last he felt that he should soon die. He was asked if he felt ready to die. He answered: "Yes, I hav been ready for a long time. I feel happy." In a little while the great change came. And we hav met to say good-bye, and deposit his remains in the grave. With him the last page of his history is written—the record is complete. An honest man lies before us, who was honest not only with his neighbors but honest with himself. He was an independent thinker. He thought his own reason taught him what to believe, and what not to believe. Who among us can say, or will feel disposed to say, that there is a being anywhere in the universe who will condemn or punish a man for this? But for me, I will say in the language of another: "I will leave the dead where nature leaves them. Whatever flower of hope springs up in my heart I will cherish. But I cannot believe that there is any being in this universe who has created a human being for eternal pain."

After this brief and informal ceremony had been gone through with the large concourse of friends formed in procession, two by two, and marched to the cemetery, about sixty rods distant, where the remains were interred. Mr. Evans leaves a devoted wife and three affectionate children to mourn his loss.

Comstock's Progress.

This indefatigable worker in an evil course is untiring in his efforts to get his bill, giving him additional power to crush those against whom he fulminates his wrath, through the legislature of our state. He has been at Albany several days buttonholing senators and assemblymen, telling them how much he is doing for Christ, and showing them the filthy pictures he carries in his smut-bag. It is said by these powerful influences some of the members hav weakened and deserted the side of equal liberty and justice and hav taken up for Comstock and tyranny. Even Senator Wm. W. Astor, of this city, the wealthy capitalist and house owner, has become a champion of the detested Comstock, and uses his influence in breaking down the laws and rules which hav hitherto controled our municipal courts and police system. Comstock boasts that he has the Christian church and $50,000,000 in money at his back, and Astor and some others particularly sensitiv to the influence of money show a decided inclination to favor Comstock and his unclean vice society.

Comstock is working like a beaver, talking with impressible members in the halls of hotels as late as midnight, and even visiting them at their residences in somewhat distant counties. It is said in our daily press that his bill has been reported favorably in the senate committee. Whether it gets through the assembly with the same ease is still to be seen. There is the greatest reason for alarm at the power which this tyrannous, dishonorable man still wields. Possibly the adage, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," applies with force in this case. It may be this bill needs to become a law—this last feather needs to be added to the camel's back—to really awaken the people of this city to the danger that awaits them. Although they are, metaphorically speaking, sleeping under the very brink of a volcano, it seems they are disinclined to take alarm until the fiery flood bursts upon them and overwhelms them.

Among the rich and powerful dailies published in this city there is but one with bravery enough to fully denounce this plotter and his machinations as they deserve. This paper is Truth, and from day to day it speaks out the words of warning befitting a true sentinel on the ramparts of liberty. All honor to the brave and fearless sheet! If the other papers of the city would but take the same manly course, it would not be long before Comstock legislation should become a thing of the past.

As a sample of the brave words of this enterprising journal, an extract or two will be given:

THE POINT COMSTOCK SCORED.

We are coming to a pretty pass when so respectable a body of men as the Judiciary Committee of the senate of New York finds it neccssary to empower a private society to "enforce all laws now passed, or which may hereafter be passed, in relation to lotteries, gambling, and obscene and indecent exhibitions in plays." Yet that is what was done at Albany yesterday.

The society referred to is managed entirely by Anthony Comstock, so that, practically, the distinguished committee advises the Legislature that the protection of the public morals demands that the enforcement of all such laws should be intrusted to Anthony Comstock. That is the point.

Before this law is passed, let it be so amended as to strike out all the qualifying words, thereby empowering Comstock to enforce all laws now passed, or which may hereafter be passed. After that, all the district attorneys, sheriffs, and courts may be abolished, and a great saving to the public purse will result.

Such an amendment will make the law consistent with itself and with the sentiment that demands it. For there can be no sentiment demanding it which does not acknowledge that our present form of government is a failure.

Let us add that Senator Astor's connection with this matter as its god-father will hav no tendency to elevate him in the good opinion of his constituents.

A few days earlier this same paper spoke as follows of the man who is trying to bring earth and hell to bear to take power from the district attorney and the police force of this city and place it in the hand of his private, irresponsible, ecclesiastical society, whose chief agent and factotum is himself:

COMSTOCK GETS THE COLD SHOULDER.

Anthony Comstock's reception in Albany yesterday, as our correspondent described it, was the sort he deserved. His prowlings to and fro, with his historic black bag gorged with the sample corruptions he is so fond of exhiblting to our rural lawmakers, hav become an offense in the eyes and nostrils of decent men. Like the migrations of the skunk, they leave their trace rankly behind them.

Assisted by that protoplasmic humbug, Kilian Van Rensselaer, and by Vaseline Colgate, the lobbyings of this social hyena are not rendered any the more savory. It is as well for respectable citizens that this is so. By permitting the corruption farmers to disgust the people they demand favors from, the work of defeating their schemes is rendered all the easier.

The legislativ coldness to the Comstock bill is a fact the citizens can congratulate themselvs on. If it was a question of endowing the police with extra powers for the suppression of vice no one would find any objection to it. What all men object to is that such a creature as Anthony Comstock should be invested with more authority to abuse than he already possesses.

Later on, after this storer and conveyer of the most indecent pictures had tried to excuse himself to the reporter of the paper, it printed the following editorial:

COMSTOCK'S PLEA.

Anthony Comstock, in his conversation yesterday with a Truth reporter upon his bill authorizing the officers of his society to arrest all persons violating the present laws and all laws which shall be hereafter passed in relation to lotteries, gambling, and obscene and indecent exhibitions and plays, complained that, at present, his officers hav less power than the humblest policeman. Comstock may not be unreasonable in finding fault with our police officers for not performing their duties in regard to these matters, but if he is really desirous of abating these nuisances why does he not proceed against the dilatory officers? Because one set of officers does not do its duty we need not create an additional set. Better reform the old ones.

We do not want any man or any man's society to hav any such power as Comstock is seeking. In the hands of unprincipled men such power could be used with terrible effect, and if, maybe, Comstock's society is a most virtuous institution now, we do not know what it may become in the future. In fact, it is oppressivly fanatic already.

Comstock says that his society does not wish to assume a censorship over these matters, yet that is exactly what the power sought for would giv it.

In view of the power which Comstock hopes will soon be placed in his hands by the legislature of the Empire state, it is said that he is laying his plans to pounce down upon the theaters of the city so soon as he is in possession of the desired power to wield over them. If the desire of his heart is realized, it is expected that several of our theater managers will be arrested and be subjected to the onerous suits at law which he will inaugurate. His fiendish fondness for bringing trouble and expense upon others will prompt him to this course of conduct; and if he can only obtain the power which his tyrannical nature yearns for, our courts will at once be filled with prosecutions of his procuring, and we will hav full opportunity for realizing the blessedness of being still more under the rule of an ultra-orthodox ecclesiastical society.

In this connection it is but proper to call attention to the indorsement given to Comstock by no less a personage than ex-Rev. F. E. Abbot, formerly of the Index and the National Liberal League. After holding his peace for the better part of a year, he now breaks forth in the Free Religious Index of the 5th inst. in praise of his friend Comstock and the lying book he has thrown upon the world. What could there be more natural than that Comstock should send a volume of his lies to Abbot to review, and what more natural than that this pretended Liberal should be charmed with it, and that he should take this opportunity to express his approbation of his friend? Hear him talk:

Accordingly, one hundred and twenty-six pages of the book are devoted to the "Liberal" crusade against the postal laws during the past five years, especially as it relates to the Liberal League. Mr. Comstock, who falls into one or two mistakes [very slight of course] in telling his story (chief of which is his construction of the resolutions passed at the Centennial Congress of Liberals in 1876), evidently tries to be fair and accurate throughout. He draws a just distinction between the Liberals who favored and those who opposed the cry for "repeal," and—to his great credit—takes pains to do justice to the motivs of the latter class. This is very explicitly done on page 393 and elsewhere. But he makes a scathing exposure, by name, of the record of those who were most prominent as "repealers." It is a melancholy enough exhibit for all who believe that Liberalism must win the moral confidence of the whole community, if it is ever to compete successfully with superstition, or be felt as a positiv power in the molding of legislation. Notwithstanding the too great heat of style in which the book is written, which will to some extent defeat its own objects, I cannot withhold the expression of my own respect for the fundamentally sound, upright, and honest motivs which actuate Mr. Comstock, or omit to commend his book to the careful study of all who know that Liberalism must yet make a new record on this subject if it is to be at last a great blessing or felt power in American history. F. E. ABBOT.

After this admiring friend of Comstock has for so many months abstained from inflicting upon the ears of the Liberal public the utterance of such wails, such libels, and such bitter malice as for two years he was in the habit of dealing out in weekly installments, it is hoped his self-righteous soul (on the supposition that he has one) will feel a measure of relief approximating somewhat to that which his former readers hav enjoyed for the past ten months.

Some acts that are intrinsically despicable and mean are still more despicable and mean when performed at a moment when they are calculated to do the greatest injury. Treachery and treason to one's own country and people are always most despicable, but Benedict Arnold rendered himself especially despicable by selecting the very moment for his evil work when his country and his cause most needed his sturdy efforts in their defense, and when his treachery conferred the greatest help upon the enemy. So it was with Abbot; his treachery to the cause of liberty would hav been despicable at any time; but it was doubly so when the little army of freemen—or those, at least, who wished to be free—were struggling to remove from the statute books of our country one of the most odious laws ever enacted in the United States or any other country. His opposition to the efforts put forth by lovers of constitutional liberty, accompanied by his numerous misrepresentations and falsehoods, whether they really prevented the efforts the brave band of contestants were making, at least served the purpose of showing the vile animus which actuated the man, and his treachery to the cause of true Liberalism.

So it was when the writer of these lines was thrust into a prison cell, whither he had been put at the behest of the bitterest and meanest bigotry and intolerance that has been evinced for a hundred years, directly brought about by this same Comstock. Then it was, while thus prostrate and chained, that this pretended, but false, Liberal united in a conspiracy with others equally as mean and despicable as himself to attack, to widely publish injurious private letters with which neither he nor the world had any more business than they had with the money in his pockets. Yes, then it was that he made this dastardly attack upon a fallen foe, and not only laid the damaging letters before his own readers, but used the names from a list stolen from our own office to mail thousands of his slanderous sheets to our best friends, with the view of alienating them from us and destroying us forever, both in reputation and financially. If a meaner, more despicable deed was ever enacted, no man knows where or when it was accomplished.

So it is now; just when this Comstock is again busy at applying his arts and concocting his machinations to possess himself of power never before conferred by national or state government, to oppress the unfortunate victims of his wiles he selects as his prey, that this next friend, F. E. Abbot, steps forward with alacrity to sustain him. This course is just as consistent and just as true to the vital principles of Liberalism as has been his efforts for the past three years. Just think of it for a moment, what inconsistency there is for a howler for "morality," "purity," and Pharisaical "Liberalism," to second and commend a man who hires young women with money to expose their nakedness before a company of men, he sitting looking on approvingly and feasting his coarse nature by watching the performance between one and two hours; a man who hires prostitutes and takes them to a photograph gallery to hav their nude pictures taken; a man who neglects his old, feeble father, and leaves him to wander the streets with miserable old shoes upon his feet and with nothing in his stomach for days together; a man who has slandered and belied the honest Liberals of America more than any other living person! This apologist is the pretended Liberal who cheerfully vouches for the truth of one of the vilest libels in the form of a book which was ever printed, a book in which we hav sworn are fifty positiv falsehoods, and which we honestly believe contains more than a hundred malicious lies.

It is perhaps very fitting that Francis E. Abbot should come to the aid of Anthony Comstock; and if the pernicious bill now before our legislature becomes a law there is every reason to believe that Anthony Comstock, Francis E. Abbot, Samuel Colgate, Howard Crosby, Joseph A. Britton, Parson Newman, and the most bigoted of the New York clergy will unite in a general jollification.

Book Review.

Religion as Revealed by the Material and Spiritual Universe. By Edwin D. Babbitt, author of "Principles of Light and Color," "Health Manual," etc. It is a neatly-printed volume of 365 pages, illustrated by more than fifty finely executed wood-cuts. Price, $1.50.

This is a volume of rare merit, written by a thoughtful, philosophical, benevolent, pure-minded man, whose entire views and modes of thought are in harmony with the higher spiritual philosophy. He discards all the theological absurdities that for many centuries hav darkened the minds of men, and presents in their place a natural, beneficent religion, based upon the immutable laws of the universe, which he conceives to be presided over by the supreme, central, spiritual, principle or power analogous to the conception of "God."

The first three paragraphs of his preface read thus: "Take no alarm, dear reader, at the sound of the word religion, for I hav not the least idea of conducting you into some dark, subterranean cathedral where the air is oppressiv and unnatural, but would lead you right out under heaven's sunny dome, where the joyous gospel of nature and inspiration are breathed into the soul.

"Away with devils and hobgoblins, and dogmas and traditions, and fears and superstitions! Sweep aside the cobwebs, lift the veil, clear up the mists, let in the light, illumin the soul, for then at last we may see the shining ladder which links the earth to heaven, upon which the angels are ever descending and ascending.

"True religion is the heavenly side of science, the divinest motiv power of philosophy, and yet is the very angel of every-day life which sanctifies and sweetens human loves, and tends to lift up even the humblest soul."

The first chapters treat of "The Existence and General Character of God." The subdivisions are: "Preliminary Thoughts," "Is there such a Being as God?" "Is God a Creator?" "The Argument from Design," "Is God Unknowable?" "Is God Absolutely Infinit?"

As to the unknowableness of God, in one paragraph he speaks in this way: "If we should descend to the smallest microzoa, which are millions of times too minute to be seen with the naked eye, we shall find precisely the same principles of unity and diversity, and gradation and contrast, as we do in a flower, a leaf, a tree, a world, a solar system, a cluster of solar systems, or, in fact, the whole known universe, all of which are developed on precisely the same laws of harmony throughout. What some of these characteristics are will be shown hereafter, because by knowing the phenomena of the external cosmos we may surely read the character of the Infinit One, whose developing power and glory are impressed upon the whole. We come to this conclusion, then, that we may at least get a general qualitativ, though not a quantitativ, conception of the Infinit One, while, in reality, there is no such thing as the absolutely unknowable."

To the question, "Is God absolutely infinit?" he says: "Not unless we accept the doctrin of pantheism and declare that the term God embraces the whole universe. On this plan, all objects, both material and spiritual, are a part of God, for an absolute infinity must include all time, all space, all power, all substance. Farther on, however, we shall see that there is a universal, dual, correlation of spirit and matter, which, though working together on the same general laws, are also widely different, just as the terms positiv and negativ are diverse. The spiritual side of the realm of being has its culmination of glory in what, by common usage, is termed God. It should be remembered that there are many infinities, relativly considered, in this universe. Thus, in mathematics, we say a circle consists of an infinit number or straight lines, just as a sphere includes an infinit number of circles. We speak of infinity of duration, which constitutes eternity, infinity of space, which measures the universe, infinity of knowledge or omniscience, and many other kinds of infinity. Even man, being immortal and capable of endless progression, has an element of infinity. The character of God's infinity will be spoken of hereafter."

In chapter two God as a spirit is treated. The arguments of the Atheist are considered. The arguments of the Spiritualists are given, and the author givs his own somewhat remarkable experience in spirit communion, and the means by which he obtains knowledge from invisible intelligences.

Chapter three treats "The Deific Location and mode of working," and these points are considered: "The location of Deity," "Can infinitude hav a center?" "Does God control the universe through law?" "How does God control the universe?" "The dual center of the universe," "Can the infinit by fine act upon the coarse?"

Chapter four is on "the nature of God," and these questions as subdivisions are treated: "Is God a Being of Intelligence?" "Is God a Personal Being?" "Is God a being of Absolute Attributes?" He says: "Some conceive God to be an immense man, with the virtues and some of the vices of humanity. The Parsees, founded by Zoroaster, evidently consider him to be a great spiritual sun, and are in the habit of paying their adorations to the material sun as his type. The Brahmans would present their sublime conceptions of his character by declaring it to be like the rising of a thousand suns into the sky at once. But Brahmans, Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, and many other religious sects conceive God as an infinit person, if such an expression is not a contradiction of terms, although the Brahmans, Christians, and some others also, represent a trinity of persons as constituting the ruling power of the universe."

Chapter five has for its subject "The Deific Greatness and Glory," and is subdivided into "The Greatness of God," "An Angel's Conception of the Universe," "The Glory of God," "Anthropomorphism." He makes a kind of congress, republic, or commune of God. One paragraph reads thus: "If the full glory of even one of these higher intelligences should suddenly burst upon us and be made evident to our perceptions, it would overwhelm us and we should at once conclude that it was God himself. There are beings so mighty in power and wisdom as to rule over a world, and others still more wonderful who control a whole system of worlds, acting of course under the supervision of the sublimest of all, the Infinit One, whose dominion is over the whole."

Oh the subject of anthropomorphism he says: "Men hav been so materialistic they hav made images to help them conceive of God, and some hav worshiped these images. Even now millions of Christians place images of the cross before them or of the Virgin Mary or of some other saint, and think themselvs very pious for so doing, whereas true religion of the head burns with a constant spiritual flame and lifts the soul up away from all outward images toward the infinit glory. . . . Those who can pierce beyond the veil of this life and see the sublime destiny of the soul as it mounts ever upward, will perceive that a spark of divinity dwells incarnated in every human being, and especially those who, in resemblance to Jesus, hav a high and holy purpose of life. How much higher men will rise under such inspiring conceptions of their immortal nature than they will when disheartened with the dogmas of 'total depravity,' 'inability,' 'reprobation,' 'election,' and 'God's wrath,' which condemns the majority of his own human children to endless torture!"

Chapter six has for its subject "Moral, Evil, and Deific Perfection." The subdivisions are, "The Perfection of God," "Has God Created Evil?" "Is Man Depraved," "Is Anything Innately Bad?" "Is an Endless Hell Possible?" "Is Absolute Evil Possible under Divine Law?" "Evolution." He comes to the conclusion that there is no original evil being or devil, and that evil is only a perversion of or a misapplied good. One passage reads in this way: "Every particle of the universe, both animate and inanimate, all worlds, all beings, are moving forward on the eternal law of progression, passing upward through chaotic and crude conditions into greater order, ripeness, and beauty evermore."

Chapter seven treats on "Special Providences," "A Supposed Miracle of Healing," "How God Interposes to Answer Prayer," "Does Prayer Influence God?" "The Central Principle of Deification," "Prayerfulness not Necessarily Goodness," etc.

Chapter eight shows how man and spirits assist in governing the universe.

Chapter nine reviews the creeds and practices of Christianity, showing the erroneousness of its dogmas.

Chapter ten shows the dangers of so-called infallible standards.

Chapter eleven examins the Bible miracles, prophecies, etc.; and also compares pagan ethics with Christian teachings.

Chapter twelve is in a similar line.

Chapter thirteen is devoted to "The Ethics and Religion of Nature;" chapter fourteen, "Life Under the Old Religions;" chapter fifteen, "Life Under a Spiritual Religion;" chapter sixteen, "Death Under the Old Religions;" chapter seventeen, "Death Under a Spiritual Religion;" chapter eighteen, "The Future Life." The final remarks are on the basic principles of a universal philosophy and a universal religion.

The work is carefully and well written, and will be read with great interest by thousands, especially by those inclining to the spiritualistic form of belief.

In connection, it should be stated that Dr. E. D. Babbitt, within the last few days, removed to Cincinnati, where he has children residing, and where a field of usefulness opens up before him. May health, prosperity, and long life be his portion!

"Great Infidels."

The following is a brief abstract of Col. Ingersoll's new lecture delivered at the Academy of Music, Sunday evening, May 1st:

"There is nothing grander in this world," said Col. Ingersoll, in beginning his lecture, "than to rescue from the leprosy of slander a great and splendid name, and nothing nobler than to benefit our benefactors. The Infidels of one age hav been the aureoled saints of the next. The destroyers of the old hav always been the creators of the new. There are decay and growth in the intellectual world as in the material. History shows that political rights hav been preserved by traitors, and intellectual rights by Infidels. To attack the king was treason; to dispute the priest was blasphemy. The sword and the cross hav always been allies. The throne and the altar were twins—vultures hatched from the same egg. James I. said, 'No church, no crown; no tyrant in heaven, no tyrant on earth.' Every monarchy that has disgraced the world, every despotism that has covered the cheeks of men with tears, has been copied after the despotism of hell. The king owned the body and the priest owned the soul. One lived on taxes and the other on alms. One was a robber, the other a beggar. The king ruled by force; the priest by fear, and both by both force and fear. The king said to the people, 'God clothed you in rags and housed you in hovels, and he put me in robes and gave me a palace'—such is the justice of God. The priest said to the people, 'God made you ignorant, and he made me learned and wise; obey me or God will punish you here and hereafter, forever'—such is the mercy of God.

"Infidels," Col. Ingersoll continued, "are the intellectual discoverers. It is they who hav sailed the unknown sea and discovered the isles and continents in the vast realms of thought. What would the world hav been had Infidels never existed? What the Infidel is in religion the inventor is in mechanics. The Infidel is the man who has discovered a fact, and is not afraid to tell about it. There has been for many thousand years a prevalent idea that in some way you can prove whether the thories advanced or defended by a man were right by showing what kind of a man he was. It makes no difference what was the character of the man who made the first multiplication table. When you find a result, it makes no difference who discovered it. Neither is a statement by a great man necessarily true. A pebble surrounded by diamonds is a common stone. Not all the martyrs of history are sufficient to establish the fact that any doctrin is true. Martyrdom, as a rule, establishes only the sincerity of the martyr.

"These Christians," the lecturer said, "cannot see how any man can die serenely without clinging to Christ. According to theology, God has always punished the dying who did not happen to believe in him. As long as men did nothing but make their fellow-men wretched, God is represented as maintaining the strictest and most heartless neutrality; but when some honest man, some great and tender soul, expressed a doubt as to the truth of the Jewish scriptures, or prayed to the wrong God, or to the right God under the wrong name, then the real God is represented as leaping like a wounded tiger upon the dying man to tear his wretched soul from his body. There is no account in the literature of this world of the innocent having been shielded by God. It is made to appear that God has no time to prevent crime, no time to protect the good and the pure; that he is too busy numbering hairs and watching sparrows. He is too busy watching the professors of colleges, who begin to doubt the geology of Moses or the astronomy of Joshua."

Of the fathers and early councils of the church, Col. Ingersoll said: "If it had not been for these councils we might hav been without a trinity to this day. While one of them was engaged in determining a great question, millions and billions of men were swept into hell." The lecturer said that Christianity is responsible for what he styled the current falsehoods as to the dying moments of Infidels like the Emperor Julian, Spinoza, Voltaire, Diderot, David Hume, and Thomas Paine. He said Christians forgot that Christ was an Infidel, and added, "I like him because he was an Infidel; I like him because he had sense enough to see that the old Jewish religion was not true."

Col. Ingersoll denied that there was any truth in the story that the Emperor Julian tried to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, and that therefore God came out and destroyed the workmen. "It would hav been much more sensible," he said, "for God to hav destroyed Julian and frightened the workmen." The lecturer spoke of Giordano Bruno, an Infidel of 1550, as "a man who changed his mind because he had a mind; a man who would not believe that you could make the trinity out of dough or bake God in an oven as you would a biscuit, or that you could devour the creator as you would a piece of bread. Yet," he continued, "the men who believe that when a man strikes you on one cheek you should turn the other tried to kill this man. But the fires of martyrdom never destroyed one truth, and all the churches of the world hav never made one lie true. When science began to show that the church was wrong, and that the earth is not flat, then the church began to say, 'I did not say it was flat, but that it was kinder round.'"

The lecturer told a story of an old 'Forty-niner who, when told that God made the world in six days, pointed to a desolate mountain and asked, "Don't you think God could hav put in another day to advantage right here?"

Among the Infidels of later times, Col. Ingersoll spoke of Paine, Franklin, and Jefferson as the men who gave us a Constitution without a God in it, and who were the first men to retire Jehovah from politics. To each of these men he gave a special eulogy, and he even hinted that Paine had been unjustly treated by Washington. He wanted his audience to remember that Thomas Paine was the first man who wrote the words "United States of America." Paine, he said, was the man who suggested the Federal Constitution—a grand, splendid, brave man, with some faults and many virtues. The lecturer said that all the clergymen, ministers, priests, and bishops that ever lived, from the day of Pentecost down to the last election, had not done as much for human liberty as Thomas Paine.

Col. Ingersoll defined an Infidel as "a man that has had a new idea absolutely," and an orthodox man as "a man who is petrified in his head; who is through; who is walking around, an intellectual corpse, to save the funeral expenses of his soul." He said that Infidels hav been the generous spirits of the unworthy past; the victims on the battlefields of thought; the men who hav made the world fit to liv in. "Without them," he said, "the human brain would be as empty as the churches will be soon. Why," he asked, "should we believe that honest men hav a fearful death, while those who believe in slavery, polygamy, and all sorts of crime, like the murderer on the scaffold, look smilingly around and beg us to be evangelized?" He said he had lived to see "the brand of inferiority stamped on every orthodox brain," and to see among the advanced thinkers of to-day men like Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Renan, Spencer, Haeckel, and Helmholz.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Twelfth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I felt inclined, after a first reading of your last letter, to ask you to continue without any answer from me, because I cannot see that it has any relevancy to the subject under discussion. I believe we have about two months longer in which to finish our discussion; we have considerable ground to go over, and you cannot fail to see that it is to our advantage to write concisely and pertinently. Your last letter was anything but this. May I not ask you, Please to be less diffuse, as I am anxious that we shall discuss every proposition? That I may not seem to make it necessary for you to digress again, I will merely request the reader to carefully read my last letter in connection with yours in regard to every assertion you make. I will call attention, however, to the fact that the opening half of your remarks is against not only the existence of Jehovah but of any Creator at all.

Following the example of Voltaire, Paine, and others, you assert that Moses commanded the captive virgins, mentioned in the thirty-first chapter of the book of Numbers, to be used as concubines. It is a very unjust charge. The Jews were permitted to keep them as female slaves; the law of Moses forbade abusing them. Whoredom and fornication are explicitly forbidden always, and there is a special statute protecting female slaves. It is found in Deut. xxi, 10–14: "When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thy hands, and thou hast taken them captive, and seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldst have her to thy wife, then thou shalt bring her home to thy house, and she shall shave her head and pare her nails; and she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thy house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month; and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will, but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her."

I do not think it necessary to go into the many cavils you have made to the actions of the Almighty, nor the blind folly of finite ignorance dictating to infinite wisdom the limit and scope of revelation. As the scripture says, "O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" I am truly yours, G. M. MAIR.

Chapman Replies to Gunneson.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Feb. 26th Mr. Gunneson says: "Please introduce me to Mr. Chapman, the writer of the article on 'Absolute Proofs of Continued Existence.' Being inquisitiv, I want to ask him some questions;" and this honor, for which I am profoundly grateful, was conferred upon me in the presence of the greatest audience that ever convened upon this continent. With the eyes of the one hundred thousand readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER concentrated upon us, Mr. Gunneson asks the momentous question, "Would it retard the work of the spirits to peep through two small holes of a cabinet in which is securely tied a medium, while the spirits are making a racket with bells, tumblers, guitars," etc.?

When I reflect upon the importance of this question, and consider that Mr. Gunneson has in reserve other questions equally as ponderous, I tremble for the future of Spiritualism. He thinks "this would be a good way to convince people of the 'truths' of Spiritualism," and then, out-smiling the heathen Chinee, asks, "Mr. Editor, don't you think this would be a good test?" He doubtless has conscientious scruples against using "truths" in the above sentence without quotation marks. This little straw reminds us forcibly of the fable of the wolf in sheep's clothing. Notwithstanding this little betrayal of Bro. Gunneson's animosity to the "truths" of Spiritualism, we are disposed to giv this matter our serious attention, hoping, in this pretended search after light, some hint may be given that will lead to a fair and thorough investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism. If friend Gunneson is really in earnest, I am surprised that so small a matter as peeping "through two small holes" in the curtain of a cabinet where a medium is "securely tied," and witnessing the antics of bells, guitars, etc., should be regarded as settling satisfactorily the "truths" of Spiritualism. If he could be permitted to do so, he would doubtless remove those quotation marks. I fear if friend Gunneson could be granted this privilege he would be no wiser, for all he would see would be those bells, guitars, etc., moving about without visible contact. Possibly materialized spirit hands could be seen manipulating those articles, but he would still think it a trick, or a "truth" in quotation marks. Doubtless, if he is an inspired mouthpiece of Jehovah, he would consider it his duty to lie for Christ's sake, and say the medium, although "securely tied," did it with his toes or "knee joints."

To my mind this would not be conclusiv evidence of spirit power. Intelligent Spiritualists require more than the exhibitions of mere power to prove the presence of our spirit friends. Had we never received more than the movement of ponderable bodies as evidence, thousands who are to-day happy in the knowledge of continued existence would still be groping in the dark. When knowledge, which only our loved ones beyond the river can giv, accompanies those movements, we then accept them as satisfactory proofs. Mr. Gunneson promises to be satisfied without the intelligence.

The truths of Spiritualism, Mr. Gunneson, mean an exchange of sentiments, of knowledge, and of love, between spirits and mortals. It is not whether a medium or trickster can untie himself in a cabinet, and make a racket with bells, guitars, etc. It seems to me Mr. Gunneson is either ignorant of what Spiritualism is, or is endowed with more credulity than is good for him. I fear he has too much credulity to make even a good Spiritualist. Besides, if the seeing ponderable bodies move without visible contact would convince him, he can be accommodated in broad daylight. If Mr. Gunneson had ventured to locate himself I could doubtless direct him to a medium in his vicinity, in whose presence he could witness such phenomena without having to pass through "two small holes in a red flannel curtain," but I should advise him as a brother not to be satisfied with a mere exhibition of power. No sir, demand intelligence. Make your spirit friends prove themselvs to you by tests of knowledge before you are satisfied. If you are mediumistic enough to feel their hands, or receive their thoughts, as thousands do, or if you should visit materializing mediums, and should there see, as thousands hav, with your own eyes, the beloved forms and faces of dear ones gone before, perhaps intellectual tests might not be necessary. Even there our materialized friends converse on familiar topics and giv names, dates, etc., as in days of yore, so that under all circumstances the spirit world accompany their phenomena with intelligence. All this has been written because friend Gunneson seems to be ignorant of what the truths of Spiritualism really are. If he is not ignorant of this, then his animosity has caused him to dig a pitfall, in which he has fallen, and is now ingloriously sprawling, to the infinit amusement of thousands of Spiritualists who are readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I will now answer, as I understand it, Mr. Gunneson's question, "Why would it retard the work of the spirits?" It is a fact that a certain class of spiritual manifestations must occur either in total darkness or in light modified or softened. It is also a fact that many times a concentration of mind force interferes materially with these phenomena. Last autumn, while sitting with Dr. Slade, I asked him if I could see the bit of pencil that was scratching on a slate within a foot of my face, just under the edge of the table, while his hand was in plain sight. He replied, "The concentration of your mind as directed by your eye upon the pencil would interfere so as to break conditions." I was satisfied, for I knew it was absolutely impossible for Dr. Slade to cause the pencil to write under those conditions messages from the dead and answers to questions we had written and concealed. I knew, or believed, too, that we are surrounded by a spiritual, or mind, atmosphere that is adapted to our spiritual or mind organisms the same as the air is to our physical organisms and that the action of our minds caused vibrations of the magnetic or spiritual atmosphere similar to the light vibrations of the universal ether. I knew, too, that magnetic currents or clouds often disturb seriously the action of telegraph wires, so as to interrupt the transmission of messages; also, that the faintest trace of light upon the photographer's plate would destroy the image, so I could see that a concentration of mind force, which is nothing but the magnetic vibrations of a spiritual atmosphere, would interfere so as to defeat the object which the spirits were striving to accomplish.

Spiritualism tells us that this universe is a system of worlds within worlds. We can judge of the interior properties and forces of matter only by their manifestations to our senses, and by a process of reasoning arrive at knowledge of the same far beyond the actual revelations to our senses.

We know that there is an atmosphere of air, another of universal ether that fills all space (else there could be no light), and we hav reason to believe there is still another that is adapted not only to our spiritual organism, but to the spiritual in nature everywhere, and with our ignorance of the laws which underlie and control the spiritual, it is as consistent for us to dictate to the spirits just how they shall do their work as it would be to demand that the photographer produce his pictures without protecting his plates in the darkness of his plate-holder, camera box, and dark room. My advice to all investigators of spiritual phenomena is never to dictate conditions to the spirits. Trust everything to them but your reason, and if you are honest, the mediums are honest, and the spirits are honest, results will be satisfactory every time. Of course conditions beyond the control of all parties may sometimes interfere, but persistent effort will assuredly be attended by results absolutely satisfactory without exception.

In regard to cabinet manifestations, I, for one, wish a cabinet had never been heard of. Excepting full-form materializations, perhaps, cabinet phenomena are always attended with doubts in a greater or less degree. It is true, many of our best mediums use cabinets to-day for materializations which hav been tested so much and in so many ways, and in whose presence such absolute proofs occur, that their integ- is no longer questioned by honest investigators. Yet there are those, be it said to their shame, who resort to tricks and base imitations, and thus bring reproach upon the grandest revelation of truth this world has ever known. The rule of "by their fruits shall ye know them" will always bring the investigator safely into the harbor of truth and knowledge. The fact that there is counterfeit is a proof that there is a genuin, and don't you forget it.

Yours truly, E. A. CHAPMAN.

Is Christianity True?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In answering the above interrogativ of a friend, I wrote the substance of the following:

Whatever is known to be true is either practically or scientifically demonstrable, or both. I feel sure that truth will never suffer by criticism any more than gold will hav more dross by melting. Hence if Christianity is true it will bear the severest test, for facts alone are the test of knowledge. "I shall make facts my authority, and not authority my facts." Christianity I understand to be doctrins peculiar to Christians, and taught by no other religious body in the world. These doctrins consist of two materially different propositions: 1. Total depravity of man by the sin of Adam; 2. The redemption of man by Jesus Christ. These propositions are what I call the foundation stones of the Christian edifice.

To estimate the turpitude of an offense, we must consider the knowledge and ability of the offender; so I begin with the history of Adam and Eve.

It seems Eve had never had any conversation with God; but Adam had, for God had said to him, "Of the tree of knowledge thou shalt not eat, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." A fair inference is that Adam had told Eve. Whatever perfection may be claimed for them, physical or mental, it is certain they did not know right from wrong, good from evil. They were young, and had not spent the first night in the garden, and, like children, did not see any impropriety in being naked. What turpitude would it attach to a child for an act done before it knew right or wrong, good from bad? Could we inflict even one stripe?

Eve, falling in with a talking snake, or whatever he was, found a being who could talk to her in her own language. The snake told her that God knew they wouldn't die, but would become as gods, knowing good and evil. For telling her this, the fellow has been called the father of liars. But let us look at this a little, for that is the only test of knowledge. The first inquiry to be made is, Did they die? I say, No. But theology says, "Yes, they died a spiritual death." I wish God had thought to put that in, and not leave it for progress to interpolate, and so add to that book. How could Adam and Eve hav known anything about spiritual death? In proof of the truth of what the snake said, we hav the fact that man livs to-day. And how could they hav become as gods, as God himself said they had, if they had died that day? The snake told them they would become as gods, so God and the snake said the same thing. It is quite curious that people, by sin, could become as gods—more like gods than when they were sinless.

God's testimony that they had become as gods is absolute proof that the snake told the truth when he said, "God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." And, if so, the snake was cursed for telling the truth to advance human knowledge.

So far as the narrativ goes, Adam and Eve had never been out of the garden, nor spent the first night in it. But whatever length of time they had spent there, one thing is certain—they had no idea of moral qualities, and God did not want they should hav, for he interdicted the only means of knowing—the fruit of the tree of knowledge. How exceedingly wicked it was in those children to wish to understand what was meant by good and evil, right and wrong? This constituted the great damning sin of Adam and Eve.

Were those results of the offense philosophical or natural results? It has never been pretended, to my knowledge, that the fruit contained any poisonous properties that damaged the physical or mental constitution of Adam. If the curse did not result from poisoned fruit, then it must hav been the effect of the offense itself. If the latter, then every offense from that day to this would hav produced like effects. This being the case, our present condition must be infinitly below that of Adam at the time of his offending. But do the facts of our experience justify such a conclusion? Does an offense against moral law involve our children and acquaintances in physical and mental disabilities?

Who suspects, does any father or mother suspect, that their child who has taken a forbidden fried cake is depreciated in its mental or physical capacities? No one entertains such a notion. So then we are forced to the conclusion that whatever man suffered by the fall was forced upon him as a penal infliction. It appears that a specific curse was pronounced, first, upon the snake; second, upon Eve; third, upon Adam.

But what justice there could be in cursing the snake I cannot see; he had violated no known law; God had never told him that he must not converse with those people. If, as Christians say, the devil used the snake as his medium, I ask, Is a medium to blame for the control of an almost infinit spirit? What could a snake do to resist a devil when God himself was taken by him on to a mountain and on to the pinnacle of a temple? What justice is there in punishing the snake and letting the devil, who did the mischief, go free? If I had been God I would hav killed the devil so dead that he would not hav been heard of after that. But if God had some use for him, and did not want to spare him, yet he could hav kept him chained, for he might hav known he would do mischief if he was left to run loose.

God cursed Eve. He did not say to Eve, The apple you hav eaten will greatly increase your sorrows. But he said, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." To Adam he said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee."

No one can see any connection between the act of eating an apple and the growing of thorns and thistles. Hence, whatever was the curse of the law, it was known only by divine retribution.

What was that retribution as all orthodox churches understand it? The Presbyterian "Confession of Faith" says: Our first parents, being seduced by the subtlety of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit. By this sin they fell from their original righteousness, and so became dead in sin and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body. They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this their sin was imputed, and the same debt in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity. From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposit to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil, do proceed all actual transgressions. Original sin doth bring guilt upon the sinner, whereby he is bound over to the wrath of God and curse of the law, and so made subject to death, with all miseries spiritual, temporal, and eternal.

The Episcopal and Methodist doctrin is: Original sin standeth in the corruption of the nature of every man. Paul says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." Mr. Wesley thought that the sufferings and death of the whole animal world resulted from Adam's offense. Mark now, the occasion and not the cause of the above disaster was the offense of eating a forbidden apple by the children who had no knowledge of right or wrong any more than your babe upon your knee. And all this inflicted by an infinit father whose tender mercies are over all his works. And yet the above is the chief cornerstone of Christianity. Had it not been for this curse there would hav been no occasion for Christianity. Can anyone see any just proportion between the offense and its consequences? If God is just he must apportion his stripes according to the turpitude of the offender. But it is asked, Has he not a right to do what he will with his own? Yes, if he does right. If God is just, he cannot do injustice; and Joseph Cook says what is just with men is just with God, and he ought to know. What justice requires a father to do for his children, it requires God to do for his; justice is a principle and not a prerogativ. It cannot be just to bring a sentient being into existence and then subject or neglect it to the suffering of starvation because some ancestor had done wrong. No person can be justly liable for another's offense. Just as well punish a child now for what its posterity may do or will do a thousand years hence as to punish it for what ancestors did a thousand years ago. And yet just such cases are transpiring by the million every day if Christianity is true. God in anger with Adam and Eve poured out a vial of wrath on all the world. It would hav been just and right for God to hav punished Adam and Eve for their offense according to its demerits, but to inflict the distresses of this life and death and eternal damnation on their unoffending posterity is infinit cruelty and injustice, and contrary to the conviction of every intelligent mind. If justice with God does not mean what it does with man, then we are none the wiser for being told that he is just. God can hav no prerogativ to do injustice. Suppose a professed friend of yours says a thief took your horse from your stable some night, your friend being well able to prevent him from taking the horse, but not doing so. Would you think that friend did justice by you? How would you decide this question if it was before you as a juryman?

But a little farther. Suppose that friend knows who took your horse and where the horse is but will not tell you. Is that man a friend? Does that man do justice by you? Would any intelligent being be a friend that would do that same thing? Would not that man be particeps criminis? God is doing that very same thing every day, by claiming that judgment and justice are the habitation of his throne.

The second stone upon which the Christian edifice is built is redemption by Jesus Christ.

Redemption implies that all the redeemed were justly liable to some catastrophe. To appreciate the value of what was done for us we must understand what that catastrophe was. It can be nothing less than the curse of the law which embraces all the miseries of this life, and eternal perdition in another world. To giv confidence in the reality of such redemption we must understand the character of the redeemer, and learn from facts whether he has redeemed all mankind or not. To obtain a clear view of him we need only look to the creeds of the churches. They all say that he possessed two whole and perfect natures—"very god and very man, making one Christ." The name of one was God and the name of the other was Jesus. God always was. Jesus was born of Mary; so, then, before Jesus was begotten, there was no Christ. Hence whatever constituted him Christ died. If both god and man did not die, then only one did die.

The question now is, Did God die? God is an infinit spirit, and could not be killed, nor yet die by his own volition. If I am right in this, then only Jesus died.

If it be said that Jesus imbibed divine properties in his connection with the divine being, I answer, that is assumption without the least proof. There are no two ways about this. God did die or not. If God died, then all of him died or only a part. If the son of God died, then one-third of the trinity died. If this is not admitted, then it follows that only man did die. Mystify it as you will, it matters not. If a part of God died, then all could die. But if no part of Almighty God died, then it was the substance and son of Mary that did die. This can now be settled, and we must settle it in order to a right understanding of the subject. However good, pure, kind, and benevolent Jesus was, he was nevertheless only a man. The "Confession" says the godhead and manhood were joined together in one person without conversion, composition, or confusion. God cannot be man nor man be God. If, therefore, the two are necessary to constitute one Christ, and if that Christ died, then God and man both died. If only Jesus died, then God compromised his whole claim on the whole world for the blood and sufferings of one man, although he had taken the lives of of all men before and of all men since. But take it to be true that Jesus redeemed all mankind from the curse of the law. Redemption means deliverance from liabilities. The liabilities incurred by the fall were sickness, sorrow, pain, and death. Does any one know of anybody exempt from these? All must concede that infants are innocent of actual sin; and as their sin was reckoned or imputed to them; and as Jesus by his death satisfied the justice of his father who held the judgment, who does not see that the judgment should be canceled and the debtor liberated? What justice in issuing an execution after the debt is paid? Ought not the judge to cancel the judgment, stop the process, and let infants liv without sickness or sorrow, pain or death? The child has a right to demand a receipt in full of all demands, no matter by whom the debt was paid. What justice in the infliction of pains and death if the demands of the law hav been satisfied by Jesus? It will not do to talk about infants being saved in another world. What does any one know about another world?

So long as suffering and death are embraced in the penalty for sin, and so long as Jesus gave himself as a free, full, and perfect satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and the father satisfied, why should not prosecution cease? Unless it does, what evidence hav we that there was any redemtion ever made? Paul says, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law." No conditions were stipulated upon which infants were to be saved from the curse of the law. If redeemed, why not saved? What right still to punish?

We are told in reference to adults that conditions are stipulated, and by compliance with which an application of the merits of Christ is made to them. Faith is that condition. By faith they are justified, acquitted from original and actual sin; they are reckoned righteous for Christ's sake. His merits are imputed to them. They are born again; they are created anew in Christ Jesus. Old things are passed away, and old things become new. They hav passed from death into life. They are heirs of God, joint heirs with Jesus Christ, and do not commit sin, "for he that is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God." They are translated from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God the Son. They hav great and precious promises. They shall cast out devils, shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them. Jesus said unto them: "If ye shall ask anything in my name I will do it. If any two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them. Being adopted as God's own and made the children of light, ought they not to be exempt from the curse of the law, sickness, sorrow, pain, and death? If they are not, what is redemption good for? How is it that children of God hav children that are by nature children of wrath? If children can inherit sinfulness, why not inherit righteousness as well? Poor rule that will not work both ways. What proof hav we of the truth of Christianity? But they say we shall be saved in another world. Oh, yes, it is easy to make promises in another world, but if redemption does not avail in this world, who will giv assurance for the next?

The Freethinkers' Convention.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Recently many hav inquired of me when the next annual Freethinkers' Convention will be held. In answer to that inquiry allow me to say through the columns of The Truth Seeker that it is appointed to be held at Hornellsville, N. Y., the 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th days of August.

Friends will remember that Dr. S. E. Shattuck last year very generously gave the association the use of his fine Opera House in which to hold the Convention free of charge, and at the close of that Convention promised to do the same thing this year if the Convention was appointed there. The association at once unanimously accepted the generous offer and voted to adjourn to meet there this year. In consultation with Dr. Shattuck it has been decided to hav the Convention meet on the days above mentioned. Dr. Shattuck writes, "I intend to giv the house a general overhauling and will hav more pleasant quarters for the Convention than last year."

And now allow me to suggest that every Freethinker who reads this enter the time in his or her memorandum book and make arrangements to be present on that occasion.

I shall not be in a situation this season to devote so much time and labor to the work of making arrangements for this gathering as formerly, but I hope every vice-president and each member of the executiv committee and each member of the association, and all others who feel an interest in Freethought, will each feel it is their individual concern.

As to speakers, I hope every Freethought lecturer in this country will consider that he or she is specially invited and not wait for any personal invitation. As heretofore the endeavor will be made to pay the actual expenses of the speakers.

At an early day arrangements will be made with the various railroads for reduced rates of fare, and it is hoped that better rates can be made than were obtained last year.

It is very desirable that every editor of a Liberal paper in the United States and Canada labor for the success of this Convention and make arrangements to be present with their papers and other Liberal publications. One great object of this annual Convention should be to increase the circulation of Liberal literature.

Last year I had published a very large poster that attracted great attention throughout the country and I am confident greatly augmented the attendance at the Convention. There was no state in the Union into which some of these posters did not go, and hardly a town. Quite a number went to England, and I was pleased to learn from Prof. Rawson that one was posted by Mr. Bennett back of the platform at the Brussels Congress. I am sure the great poster had a tendency wherever it was put up to elicit discussion and advance our cause. Such a poster, with many improvements, will be again published this year if the Liberals generally desire it.

And on this subject I would like information.

Will every reader of this article drop me a line saying how many posters they will use? The size will be the same as last year, and the price 10 cents each, or $8.00 for a hundred.

And allow me to say to the Liberal editors that I will print such an advertisment as each will send me of their respectiv papers, not to exceed two hundred words, on these posters.

Friends of universal mental liberty everywhere, let us all unitedly labor to make the fourth annual Freethinkers' Convention in all respects the most important convention of the kind ever held in the world.

Discussion.

Our Thirteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I rather admire your discretion in saying as little as possible in defense of a God who deliberately creates a devil whom he knows will drag billions upon billions of his children down into hell, and who is the author of all the pain, wretchedness, sickness, sorrow, suffering, and unhappiness which exist in the world, and who decreed the ignominious and painful death of his only begotten son, and just because he was faultless and spotless. The less that is said in defense of such a God the better. In fact, such heartless conduct cannot be excused. When it is said that such a God is all-mighty, all-powerful, it is tantamount to saying he is devoid of all love, all kindness, all desire that happiness should exist among men; for a God who has the power to cause happiness to be the rule in the world must have the nature and cruelty of an incarnate fiend to inaugurate boundless grief, anguish, and pain, and to continue the means to make them perpetual. He is either not all-powerful, or he is not all-good. The very fact that evil and unhappiness have an existence is positive proof that he either cannot prevent them or he does not wish to. If he wanted all the world to be happy, he certainly had not the power to bring it about. If he had the power he lacked the will, and if he had the will he lacked the power. I cannot see how you are to get rid of this. If he made the devil with the full knowledge of all the wrongs he would commit, and all that the same devil would cause others to commit, he is infinitely worse than the devil and those he dupes. But you do not like this subject and I must again commend you for declining to defend such a God.

I will admit the correctness of your statement that the arguments which militate against Yahweh's creating suns and worlds out of nothing are equally as effective against all other gods doing the same. It is just as impossible for Brahma, Ormuzd, Osiris, Jupiter, Odin, or Mumbo Jumbo to make something from nothing, as for Yahweh. They all stand upon a level, only according to the record Yahweh is the worst of the lot, and that they are all a bad lot there cannot be a doubt. They have done infinitely more harm in the world than good. They have caused men to hate and war and kill one another, and to do all other sorts of crimes and enormities. They have filled men with fear, grief, and unhappiness. The greatest consolation, however, with regard to them is that they are becoming so diaphanous that people are getting unable to believe in them any more than they can see them. One after another they are departing to the shades of oblivion.

Perhaps I am diffuse and make my letters longer than I ought to, but I like to be thorough. The subjects we are discussing are too important to be hurried over slightly. It is best to do well what we attempt to do, even if we hav not time to go over the entire ground marked out. I am favorable to the proposition you made in a private interview, that we consolidate the remaining theses; they are connected and similar and may be discussed together. In the few remaining weeks before my departure for the opposite side of the globe I trust we may be able to do the subject fair justice.

I can hardly agree with you that the matters touched upon in my last are irrelevant. As you repeatedly charged me or my authorities with entertaining vagaries, it was quite legitimate that I should look a little for vagaries on your side. I did not mention one quarter of them, but probably as many as you desire. Also as you set up the claim that your God Yahweh is a god of transcendent and infinite love, mercy, kindness, and power, it seems to me entirely relevant to examine into the truth of your claim and see whether all his acts are merciful and kind, and whether he has evinced infinite power and love. By taking the record of the old book which you so much revere it is seen that he was noted for anger, jealousy, revenge, and cruelty, and if we are to believe he still rules over the affairs of the world, he is still actuated by the same cruel, revengeful, and merciless motives. We see that sickness, pain, want, hunger, misery and all the other evils exist upon the earth, and your God of infinite power scarcely raises a finger to stop them. Innocence may suffer, beauty may languish, age may groan in agony, infancy may sicken, matrons and maidens may constantly suffer, millions may perish of starvation, famine, pestilence, and death may stalk over the earth, without his making a single motion to stay it all. The arm of despotic power may strike down the helpless, robbers may despoil the needy, pirates may plunder and kill the unfortunate voyagers, the strong hand of the assassin may murder the defenseless, widows and orphans may groan in hunger and destitution, but your God never interferes nor shows a scintilla of pity or mercy. He has not the time nor the inclination to attend to the needy and defenseless, he is too much occupied to clothe the naked, to feed the hungry, to strengthen the weak, to comfort the sorrowing, to strike down the oppressor and lift up the prostrate. He has no time to attend to these things; as Ingersoll says, "he is too busy numbering hairs and watching sparrows" to attend to the most urgent needs of poor suffering mortals. I certainly wish to give no offense, but I conceive it to be the proper thing that the defects of both sides be held up to view. If there are more on your side than on mine, let the truth appear.

It does not offend me for you to say I follow the example of Voltaire and Paine. They were bold, honest men, with remarkably clear minds, and I am proud to be their humble follower. But I wish you had shown why they were not as capable of understanding the meaning of language in the thirty-first chapter of Numbers as the holiest divines in Christendom. The very fact that the virgins were the only ones left alive, and they turned over to the soldiers and priests for their use, makes it entirely clear what purpose they were to subserve. If Yahweh wished the murderous Israelites to take the peaceful Midianites for slaves, why not make slaves of the males as well as the females? Male slaves can perform more hard labor than females, and command a higher price. And if he wished his peculiar children to have only female slaves, why did he order those thousands of young and middle-aged women put to death in cold blood who had ever known man by lying with him? Does it incapacitate a woman for being a slave to lie with a man? Has it not been the fate of female slaves in all ages of the world to lie with their masters? And was it kind and merciful in Yahweh, after ordering the deaths of the fathers and mothers, the big sisters, and the big and little brothers of those girls, to consign them as slaves to the murderers? Would it really have been much worse to have gone the whole figure and made the young girls concubines as well as slaves? Is there, then, the least certainty that when the bloody Israelites came into possession of those young girls as slaves they would not also make them submit to their foul embrace, especially as they were so lovely as to entice the holy men of Israel before the slaughter was ordered? Do you suppose that inasmuch as it was the intercourse between the sons of Israel and the daughters of Midian that caused Yahweh to order the slaughter of the Midianites he thought his chosen people would be any the less amorous when he had placed 32,000 young girls in their possession? Do you believe he expected them to exercise strict continence under the circumstances? Or have you the slightest proof that he wished them to do so?

But if, as a compromise, I agree that possibly your God Yahweh did not quite mean that the Isralelites should lie with those virgins from Midian, and if I even consent that nothing of the kind was done, will you tell me if, in that event, it was merciful and kind to send the Israelites against the Midianites to murder men and women; to steal all their cattle, sheep, and asses; to burn their cities and their houses, and to kill all the little boys, all the male infants of the nation, and make slaves of all the little girls? Was it not—the very best side out you can put it—a most hard and cruel order? If you think me "coarse," let me assure you that my language is not half so course as is that murderous, horrible Bible story.

In your last paragraph you make what are doubtless very sage and pregnant observations about criticising the actions of the Almighty, about finite ignorance dictating to infinite wisdom; and you quote a passage of scripture about man replying against God, and which asks if the thing formed shall say unto the thing that formed it, "Why hast thou made me thus?" Some important questions are opened up here, and a few remarks seem in order. The relation between the finite and the infinite is a debatable one, and it may be set down as an axiom that the finite cannot injure or do wrong to the infinite, nor sin against it. Infinite is a big word, and it is much larger than the sun, much higher, much farther away, but we cannot even do the slightest injury to the sun. We may try to make faces at it, and spit toward it, and shout insulting words at it, and even hold up a blanket to prevent its shining upon a little spot of the earth, but the glorious old orb is not offended; it does not mind it; it rolls and burns and shines right along without caring the least thing about what we are doing, saying, or thinking. We can neither anger it nor please it; flattery and curses are alike unavailing; we cannot sin against it, we cannot dim its rays nor change their course. In my belief it is the same with the infinite. It is not in our power to harm it in the slightest degree, nor can we in the smallest degree add to its pleasure. The infinite, in familiar language, is indeed a "big thing;" altogether too much for us to take in or to know anything about. We can imagine that time or duration is infinite, endless, never having begun and never coming to an end; we can dimly conceive that space is infinite, having neither bounds nor limits, center nor circumference. We can think, too, that space is full of matter in some form (which is also infinite), a portion of which, in obedience to universal laws, has aggregated into suns and worlds, and probably was ever so. We cannot think there was ever a time when space did not exist, nor that it was ever spoken into existence. We inevitably have to admit, then, that space always was, and that neither Brahma, Osiris, Jove, Yahweh, nor Mumbo Jumbo invented it or got it up.

It is going but a step farther to imagine that space has ever been occupied by matter in some form much as it is now. It is difficult to think of a time when space was without a particle of matter in it and remained so for decillions of ages, until less than six thousand years ago, some being having spoken it into existence. That is simply one of the crudest vagaries of mythology, or theology, as you prefer. It is reasonable to suppose that so long as space has existed this something has ever acted in obedience to its own inherent, eternal laws. As it is found that not an atom of matter can be brought into existence from nonentity, nor an atom can be destroyed or changed into nonentity we can partially understand that matter is eternal and a part of the infinite.

But what is the theological idea of the infinite? Why, that he is an imaginary big thing in the form of a man, who has a throne somewhere above the clouds, with his son sitting at his right hand, a multitude of angels surrounding him, with a full orchestra of harpists playing eternally before him, and with 124,000 persons dressed in white constantly bowing before his throne, ever crying, "Holy, holy, art thou, Lord, God of heaven and earth." That old Jewish book tells us that its God has parts and organs. It speaks of his head, his face, his eyes, his nose or nostrils, his ears, his mouth, his breath, his tongue, his voice, his arms, his hands, his lips, his feet, and even his back-side. If he is infinite, all his parts must be infinite. The infinite extends everywhere; there is no place where it is not. Can you then imagine an infinite being, an infinite person, an infinite head, an infinite eye, an infinite ear, an infinite nostril, an infinite mouth, an infinite tongue, an infinite arm, an infinite hand, an infinite leg, an infinite foot, or even an infinite back-side? Then can you imagine that infinite being with all these infinite parts getting into a small box four feet long and three feet high, made of shittim wood or gopher wood, and remaining there year after year? Or can you conceive how this infinite being whose residence is just as much as here in Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune, the sun, Sirius, Orion, the North Star, the Pleiades, Alcyone, the Milky Way, and all the countless constellations, systems, suns, and worlds—many of which are so far away from us that light traveling at the rate of 200,000 miles per second requires millions of years to reach this planet—could be content to make a little, miserable, broken, mountainous country called Palestine, forty miles wide and one hundred and forty miles long, lying near the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, his abiding-place, making, too, a crude, restless, warlike, semi-barbarous nation of Arabs to be his chosen and peculiar people, showing very little love or concern for the other inhabitants of the earth? Now tell me, is not that cramping and dwarfing down the Infinite with a vengeance?

I must confess to you I can believe nothing of the kind. I do not believe that the Jewish Yahweh was the infinite at all. He was merely a crude, ignorant, human conception, first a mere tutelary divinity presiding over that small tract of rocky hills and valleys, probably first devised by some interested priests, but who never had any existence save in the minds of those priests and their credulous dupes, any more than had Ormuzd, Fohi, Osiris, Odin, and Mumbo Jumbo. It is a burlesque upon the infinite to pretend that Yahweh is that infinite.

It does not follow because the Christians have adopted this Jewish God, because they have somewhat reformed him, civilized him, and made him partially respectable, that he is the infinite; that he spoke the universe into being; that he dwells equally in all the constellations, systems, suns, and worlds. Yahweh is decidedly of too small a pattern to fill immensity, or even to fill the conception of the infinite in the mind of an ordinary sensible human being. As much as he may be reformed, as much as he may be lauded and extolled, it still remains against him that he is unfeeling, cruel, and merciless; that if he has power to prevent and destroy evil he does not exercise it; and here still remains the damning truth against him that he deliberately planned the disgraceful execution of his own dear son to make amends for his own unpardonable blunder.

Perhaps I need not again tell you that I do not believe in the existence of any such personage. There is not the first particle of proof that there is any such being; he is simply the outgrowth of crude, ignorant, superstitious minds, and it is only perpetuating the grossest and most pernicious superstitions ever known to continue to preach him to the world and to terrify old women, silly men, and inexperienced children about such a monster, and to frighten them out of all the happiness of existence, to which they are entitled, by the ceaseless outcry about his anger, his wrath, his justice, and the everlasting, burning, fiery lake of hell which he has prepared expressly for his own helpless, little, finite children. No, I cannot and will not believe in such an infinite. My idea of the God of this glorious old universe is immensely above that horrid Jewish monstrosity who is governed by passion, anger, revenge, malice, cruelty, vindictiveness, mercilessness, and spite. My God is guilty of none of these base things, and has made no hell to burn his creatures in and no devil to punch them under the fiery waves. My God is so much greater and grander than yours that I would not exchange for all the gold and diamonds in existence. Your God is a small, man-made affair, while mine is the boundless universe itself, including all matter and all force.

If there is such a being, and he is infinite, all I can say about it is, he possesses infinite hatred, infinite cruelty, infinite malice, and infinite horror. Far better would it have been had he never stepped into existence, better that he had never made the experiment of world-making, better that he had never created an offspring of fallible human beings only to suffer eternally. Far better that he had remained in idleness somewhere in vacuity ten thousand times ten thousand decillions of ages longer than to bring such wholesale and everlasting misery and torture into existence. The hope that now and then one will be saved, and that harps will be placed in their hands, crowns upon their heads, and they join the flexible squad, bowing perpetually before the white throne, praising him that sitteth thereon for his infinite mercy, love, and forgiveness, will make very poor amends for the millions of billions of their fellow-beings who are in the fiery gulf in the accutest agony, and this to be endured from everlasting to everlasting.

Everlasting and forever are big words; they mean a very long period, as Col. Ingersoll very forcibly exemplified in a recent lecture. He said let every flake of snow that ever existed represent a figure nine, every drop of water in the oceans, seas, lakes, rivers, and streams on the earth represent a figure nine, multiply these together as many times as there are figure nines; then let every blade of grass that ever helped to form the green carpet of the earth represent a figure nine and multiply again; then let every leaf of the forest that ever grew represent a figure nine, then multiply again; then let every grain of sand on the shores of the oceans and on the earth represent a figure nine, and with each multiply this vast product again, and let the total sum represent the number of millenniums of horror and agony for poor helpless mortals, and they will form but a very small fractional part of the forever, the everlasting which your merciful God Yahweh has foreordained for his own infinite enjoyment in looking down into the vast dark and smoking abyss of hell where ninety-nine-hundredths of all his helpless creatures are suffering the tortures of the damned, serving out the term of years of all those nines multiplied unceasingly together.

You believe in this kind of a God and in this kind of an eternity for his own offspring to endure, but I do not. It is the most absurd horror that the brain of superstition ever conceived. There is no such God, there is no such torture. The whole thing is the invention of vile priests to frighten and terrify ignorant men, women, and children, and to force them to contribute to the support of these same idle priests, and the abomination is kept up even until this day. The Bible teaches this kind of a God, this kind of a hell, and hundreds of thousands of priests are preaching it to their ignorant dupes. I believe it all to be a monstrous and infamous lie. There is not a particle of proof that anything of the kind exists. It is all a monstrous conception evolved from the brains of superstitious, malicious, and designing priests. They draw this horrible doctrine from that book which was written by men in an age when but a tithe of the knowledge was in existence that we have to-day, but a superabundance of superstition.

This designing class of priests and bigots in all the different nations which have existed have for thousands of years been busying themselvs in making gods. Thousands of gods have been devised; some have been made of wood, some of stone, some of brass, and some even of fine gold. Many have been invested by their makers with monstrous attributes. They have been shown to be cruel and merciless; but not one of them in cruelty and mercilessness begins to compare with the Yahweh of Jewish and Christian mythology, the same God which you bow down to and claim to love and adore.

But a change is coming over the spirit of the horrid dream. The gods are becoming far less powerful; they are "losing their grip." Men and women are learning to be independent, thinking beings; they are even daring to judge for themselves and to disregard the lies and curses of the priests. Yahweh, with the rest, is losing his control over the nations. He is a later creation than many of the other gods, but though the latest and the worst, he is destined to take the same road to oblivion. He is fading, fading away; he is less and less believed in, and the world is growing the better for it. His hell, too, I am glad to state, is cooling down; the brimstone is being exhausted, the flames are not so lurid as of yore, and do not stream up nearly so close to the battlements of heaven; its terrors are greatly modified; and if the influence of the hellish priests can be destroyed, hell will go entirely out of fashion, and may perhaps be rented out for flower and fruit gardens. It is even so now that many clergymen who esteem themselves orthodox will confess to you that they no longer believe in a sulphurous hell, that it is only a thing of human invention, and that a big personal devil, with hoofs and a long, barbed tail, is only a myth of the dark ages of the past, which, in a few more decades, must entirely pass out of the belief of intelligent human beings.

It must be acknowledged, however, that many vindictive superstitious souls still hang on to the doctrine of an angry God, a spiteful devil, and a burning hell. They hug these horrid myths to their bosoms as though they were the dearest objects in existence. They are like the pious Baptist deacon who once spoke in meeting in this vein: "Brethren, there is a dangerous doctrine being preached in our midst. We are told that human beings are not to be eternally damned. We are told that there is no devil, and that there is no hell; but, brethren, let us hope for better things." This pious Christian loved to think there was a hell for his fellow-beings to roast in. He, like thousands of his brethren, did not believe hell was ever made for himself; it was not pre-ordained for him or for his family, but for that hated neighbor of his round the corner. This is the characteristic of nearly all believers in hell. It is not for them, but for those other wretches who do not attend their church nor help pay their preacher. They themselves are to be crowned and have a harp placed in their hands, while their neighbors are thrust down into the fiery gulf to serve out the period of all those nines.

I would be truly glad if higher, grander, and more happifying thoughts could occupy your mind than a morbid belief in such a God as Yahweh and such a devil as he made to torment his creatures, and such a hell as he expressly prepared to burn them in to all eternity. When you are able to take a more correct view of the realities of the universe, of the truths which science is revealing, the utter falseness and frivolity of such myths as angry gods, malicious devils, and fiery hells, you will have a far greater measure of truth, and enjoy a much greater degree of happiness. If you really believe in a being who consigns nine-tenths of the human family to endless torture, it must render you very unhappy. Even if you hope that your righteousness may enable you to join the harpists in the upper circles, you can hardly be sure that your mother, brothers, and sisters, your cousins and aunts, and all your loved friends will be as fortunate. Can you really be happy when you believe that untold millions at this very moment are suffering the tortures of the damned, with an endless eternity of the same kind before them? I will indulge the hope that the bright rays of the sun of truth may penetrate the fogs and mists of superstition which now surround you, and that you may be able to send all the false and horrible myths of the ages of error to the gulf of forgetfulness.

CHRIST'S TEACHINGS.

I will now return to a consideration of the nature of some of the teachings which Jesus is credited with, though I fear my prolonged remarks about mad gods and devils burning helpless souls in hell will necessitate brevity on my part.

You show much the same disposition to defend the son in his lapses from the straight line of sensible and strict virtue that you exhibit in defending the father for his anger, injustice, cruelty, and revenge. But it certainly is singular that I need to use many words to show you that Jesus taught improvidence and scouted the idea of making sensible provisions for the future. It plainly is not a sound doctrine to teach or a safe practice to follow to take no thought of life, as to what shall be provided to eat, to drink, and to wear. The birds are not good patterns for man to follow. It is true they do not sow or reap, but they often die out in hard winters. At the appearance of winter they largely migrate to southern climes, but men would make but little progress in developing and improving the world to pursue that roving course. The lilies are a still worse guide for us. They simply stand idly in the fields, making not the least effort toward sustaining life, and invariably perish at the first breath of winter. Even the wicked are doing much better than making birds and lilies of themselves. To follow the advice of Jesus in this respect would be to return to the worst form of savagism. One of the prominent distinctions between civilized men and savages is that the former make proper provisions for future necessities while the latter do not. Perhaps Jesus was a savage. He certainly was a tramp. The injunction, then, "Take no thought for the morrow," is a pernicious one. And if mankind at large were to depend upon subsisting by prayer, as you seem to approve, instead of making daily exertions to meet the needs of the future, it would surely soon reach the lowest degree of want and poverty. So the teachings of Jesus and yourself would, if followed, lead to the direst results.

I notice it is very convenient for you, in apologizing for the unsound teachings of Jesus, to dodge behind the claim of that he spoke metaphorically. You have no authority for doing this, and your plea that he descends to metaphor and riddles, a language which plain people cannot understand, tells more strongly against him than for him. You attempt to evade the moral force of his evil advice to his disciples to such of them as had not a sword to sell their garments and buy one, by the ridiculous conundrum, "Is not the above almost too childish to seriously answer?" No, by no means. The advice was seriously given, it was a serious error, and demands a serious answer and explanation. Your effort to evade the odium of such council by a frivolous and slurring question may be taken as a mark of your inability to answer.

It is amusing to see you endeavoring to save your Jesus from the condemnation of falsehood in promising his twelve disciples that they should sit on twelve thrones ruling over the twelve tribes of Israel, upon the supposition that the words may yet be fulfilled. As 1,850 years have passed since the promise was made, as ten of the tribes of Israel were utterly lost hundreds of years before the promise was made, and as there is not the slightest indication that for a thousand years to come the twelve thrones of the children of Israel will be established in Judea, and if they are that the twelve disciples will set upon them, the falsity of the promise and the futility of your defense are equally obvious.

You try to make it appear that Jesus did not instruct his disciples to take the man's ass without permission, but you have no authority in the record for this supposition. He did not command the disciples to ask permission of the owner; no more than he asked permission to stroll, he and his disciples, in another's cornfield on Sunday and pluck corn. By the law given by his father, that would have been sufficient cause for his death. But, as he, probably, was sent to die for a greater purpose, he was not killed for violating the Sabbath.

You are unwilling to have it appear that Jesus acted in a furious manner when he went into the temple and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, upset the seats of those who sold doves, and drove them out by beating and scourging them and calling them thieves. If it would not require a furious manner on the part of a single person to thrust, beat, and drive out several others, I am very much mistaken. You accuse me of exaggerating the record, and say there is no hint of beating and flogging. Here you are again wrong, as you are in nearly every position you occupy. For proof that he made a scourge of cords and drove out the sellers of cattle and doves, and the money-changers, I refer you to John ii, 15.

I perceive you make no attempt to defend the conduct of Jesus when he got angry at the fig-tree for not being in bearing when it was not the season for figs. You again show your discretion in this, as you have in numerous other instances, in skipping the hard places, as the country boy in learning to read skipped the hard words. Perhaps it is the easiest way to get along with such difficult points, just to ignore them. But it certainly showed very poor judgment for a man, and much more so for a god, to expect a tree to bring forth fruit in the winter or early spring, and then to fly into a passion and curse the tree and kill it because it did not violate the laws of nature and bear fruit out of season. None but a fourth or fifth-rate god could be guilty of anything of the kind. But when we remember that this account was not written till a hundred and fifty years after the events are said to have occurred we must make some allowance for mistakes and exaggerations.

You have made some attempt to evade the force of other instances of defects I pointed out in Jesus's teachings, but your excuses and apologies do not seem to have force enough to require any notice from me. I will at all events leave them until you comment on the other twenty-five imperfections. I will leave it with our readers to decide whether I did not point out absolute defects, and whether you have been successful in your excuses and evasions.

You accuse me of repetitions in my hurried examination of the defects in Jesus's teachings. As there is considerable repetition in his remarks, I may have slightly caught the infection. But to keep my count good, and make up for the repetitions, I will mention now two or three more notable instances in his teachings where the sentiment and moral did not rise to the point of first-class divine love and wisdom, and to leave the numerous others till another time.

1. He held up the danger of "the judgment," of "the council," and of "hell fire" (rather an incongruous triplet) as an incentive to abstain from light and angry words against a brother. In sublime and exalted sentiment Juvenal far excelled him when he said,

> "Bad men hate sin through fear of punishment,
> Good men hate sin through very love of virtue."

Jesus, you will see, taught secondary motives and much lower than those of Juvenal; the latter was only a man and a heathen, while Jesus is believed to be the God and creator of heaven and earth.

2. When he instructed his hearers to give alms and to say their prayers in such a manner as to secure a personal or selfish reward, it was another instance

Geology and Revealed Religion.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

In attempting to say a few things upon this subject, I expect to advance no new idea, but shall be more than content if I succeed in recalling to the reader's mind some forgotten thought of a wiser man.

While much may be said about it, yet there are few topics invested with so many difficulties in the way of logical demonstrations. This, however, arises from the fact that both geology and revealed religion are matters of belief, little in one and nothing in the other being susceptible of absolute proof.

As to the truth or falsity of speculativ geology I hav nothing to say more than that I believe its truth necessitates the falsity of revealed religion, while its falsity does not establish the truth of religion. There is a class of scientists who hold both to be true, and of this class none hav written a better defense of their position than has Prof. Hitchcock in his text-book on geology. Viewing it from a Christian standpoint it seems faultless, but when placed under the microscope of materialistic reason many defects and glaring blunders are discernable, and in the following paragraphs I shall attempt to point out some of the most fallacious of these.

Prof. Hitchcock attempts to make them agree, first, in fixing the time of the commencement of the creation, interpreting "in the beginning" to mean any date upon which scientists may care to agree. But this is really too indefinit, as the language of Genesis must mean one of two dates, either the beginning of time, or was used to indicate the part of the work first performed, as we would say of the builder of a house, "in the beginning" he laid the foundation, which would be synonymous with saying he first laid the foundation. It is silly nonsense to talk of the beginning of time, and I think it is but fair to giv to the expression the latter meaning.

The second is, "Neither fix the date of man's appearance upon the earth." While this may seem true, yet there is really a great discrepancy in this respect, the Bible fixing the time within six days, 144 hours, of the first act of creation, while geology fixes this time at an indefinit number of years subsequent to the azoic age.

Third. That they agree in representing the creation as the work of God. While I admit of some ineffable agency, I deny the possibility of all things being the handiwork of such a God as is described by the Bible. Whatever force brought this about must hav been coextensiv with space, which is limitless. No body possessed of an "image" can be infinit.

Fourth. That they agree in representing the instrumentalities employed in the work of creation. Not so. The Bible represents each phase of creation as the direct work of God, accomplished instantaneously. Geology represents each order as having been years in perfecting itself, and as having been continually progressing.

Fifth. That they both represent intervals of repose in the progressiv work of creation. The Bible represents no repose, save of a few hours; geology represents years of gradual improvement, with no radical change.

Sixth. That they agree in giving the earth a very early revolution. Geology shows the necessity of this revolution at the time when the earth was yet a fluid mass. The Bible says nothing of it. The man who wrote Genesis never dreamed of such a thing. This point furnishes evidence of more than one contradiction between the two. It renders impossible the operation described in Genesis i, 6–9, of making a firmament, etc. This revolution necessitated action upon the earth of other planets, which according to the Bible were not created until the fourth day, or until the mesozoic period, when land had appeared and fishes inhabited the seas. This revolution of the earth in its primeval state not only furnishes proof of planetary influence, but also forever settles all dispute about the length of the Mosaic days. This latter point, however, the professor frankly admits, and thereby deals a death-blow to "several fine theories which hav been based upon the supposition that before the fourth day, when the sun and moon were created, the earth's revolution was much slower than afterward, and, therefore, Moses did not intend us to understand the days as periods of twenty-four hours. Science now shows that such has always been their length."

Seventh. That the Mosaic account of creation allows us to suppose an indefinit interval between the first day and "the beginning," which may correspond to the vast periods of geological history. As we said in the commencement of this article, this translation of the phrase "in the beginning" is undoubtedly an erroneous one; but if it be admitted, it does not help the matter a particle; it only brings us to the azoic period, and then we would hav but six thousand years for the four other great periods, with their numerous epochs, while it is clearly demonstrated, so far as scientific hypothesis is concerned—and we hav no other evidence—that more than that time is required for the age of man alone. Perhaps some are not yet satisfied and we will go still further. Admit all these hypotheses to be true, and we are brought to but the sixth day at the best, while the Bible plainly speaks of God resting on the seventh day—a geological period not yet here.

Another great discrepancy is in the chronological order of creation. Moses has the creation of the fishes on the fifth day, while in geology they appear in the third or palezoic period, and other sea animals appear as early as the eozoic period. In geology class mammalia belong to the cenozoic period, or age of man, while Genesis makes two days of mammal creation. True, some mammals appeared earlier in this period than man, but if we take cognizance of the epochs and sub-epochs we become involved in a still greater trouble, for we hav from twelve to seventeen distinct epochs, and can in no way compare these to the Mosaic days.

Still another point of resemblance is said to be that both furnish evidence of evil existing in the world prior to the age of man. Geology does, it is true, but to say the Bible does, is indeed a wonderful blunder for a Christian to make, since it has been a favorite theme with the clergy to dwell upon the perfect harmony of the world prior to that evil day when Eve partook of the forbidden fruit. Did not God pronounce all his works good? We hav been told that no thorns, no thistles grew to lacerate the hand of innocent youth as it plucked the blossom from the parent stem. We hav been told that all suffering and sorrow came as a penalty for one little sin of our forefather. We hav been told that all was joy, peace, and happiness before that terrible day, but science has robbed us of this utopian delusion.

As for the inference that the various species of organic beings which hav appeared upon the earth are the result of a divine creating power, it must be said to be inconsistent at least, for if the present state of the earth is the great end toward which the creator looked, or that the end is yet to be reached, then hav countless years of time been wasted, innumerable beings sacrificed, and untold sufferings endured. The earth is imperfect; was it an imperfect design and designer?

The above are the points upon which the Christian scientists hav based their faith in the truth of both geology and revealed religion as they are both popularly understood to-day. It is really a source of surprise to contemplate the depths of assumption to which Christians will descend to find some evidence with which to prop their tottering creeds.

Geology was given us by science; the Bible comes to us through superstition. Science is truth; superstition is error. Science has come up through years of assiduous toil and mental labor. Superstition has been fed by pomp and clothed by power. One develops reason, the other crushes it out. The pathway of science, though a rugged one, is lined with the bright buds of thought, the fragrant flowers of reason and sweet fruits of reality; but the pathway of superstition is a vista of upas trees hedged by the deadly nightshade, while here and there are the bare spots where its cohorts hav paused to light the campfires of persecution and cruel hate, and left bleaching in its ashes the bones of murdered innocents.

The new Bible and the new geology may agree; the alembic of time may mold new ideas and institute a new religion; natural selection may go on until angels are evolved from men; but of one thing we may be fully assured, the religion of the Bible is a thing of the past and the present, but cannot be of the future. The curtain in its temple has been rent in twain and its holy of holies shown to be a hollow mockery, the barren ideality of a flitting dream.

Criticism of All Religious Revelations.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

The faithful calls revelation the instruction given him, as he believes, by God or by the gods. There are several revelations, e.g., the Christian, the Jewish, the Mohammedan, that of the Mormons, etc. Every faithful thinks the revelation of his religion to be the true one, but already the renowned philosopher, Fichte, has proved that such a belief is a superstition. On what arguments build the followers of revelations among all nations their creed? They assert that revelations were made, e.g., to the Roman king Numa Pompilius by the nymph Egeria; to the Hindoos by Zoroaster and Buddha; to Moses by Jehovah; to the Christians by Jesus Christ; to the Mohammedans by the archangel Gabriel, etc. They grant unlimited confidence to these mediums of the revelations as persons who, for the sake of their honesty, were generally much respected. Besides, they believe that several of these mediums hav proved their divine mission by wonders.

Against the latter argument a sound criticism answers the following remarks. The marvelous stories are related in the same books which contain the revelations. The argument of the faithful runs about in this way: "I take this book to be a revelation because there are related wonders, and I take these wonders to be true because they are related in the book of revelation." The authenticity of a revelation, then, is staid upon miracles, and, inversely, the authenticity of the miracles upon the divinity of the revelation. Consequently the argumentation runs in a circle. For illustration, let us apply this sentence to the Mohammedan faith. The Mohammedan believes in the divinity of the Koran, because in this book is stated that Mohammed has received it from the archangel Gabriel. But who warrants him the truth of this statement? He replies, "The Koran." He supposes, thus, the divinity of the book which he ought to prove by the wonder as already proved. But as the narrativ of Gabriel is evidently a fiction, the divine authority of the Koran also falls down. It is the same with the divine origin of all revelations whose authenticity is founded on miracles.

Besides, how many revelations hav been given? The Hebrews received one about 1500 B. C.; the Romans about 730; the Bactrians, 609; the Hindoos two generations later. The Christians possess even two, the Mohammedans and the Mormons three revelations. Which one is of all the true, the genuin? To the Jews Jehovah spoke in Hebrew, but this language was, at least after their return from the Babylonian captivity, out of use. Most of the gospels were written in Greek, and the sacred books of the Hindoos in Sanskrit, which language is nowadays dead. Consequently these revelations were promulgated in languages which were or are unintelligible to those for whom they were designated. In order to get knowledge of such revelations there are only two ways, people must either study those foreign languages themselvs or get them interpreted by others. The first way is to most men inaccessible, because they hav no talent, time, and opportunity for such difficult studies; therefore only the second is left open to them. They want translators and priests. But who warrants them, even in this case, that these persons communicate them the revelations right and unaltered? The doctrin of the Lord's supper is said to hav got already one hundred different interpretations. Which one is true? In such an important concern as our salvation, which is pretended to depend upon our belief in the revelation, we must not follow blindfold even our parents.

It is self-evident that these sacred books are only in the hands of the clergy. At least the Catholics during many centuries were forbidden to read the Bible. But can a man in such an important matter (we say it again) on which our eternal happiness depends (as they say) trust the communication and interpretation of others? Has the deity no simpler, more efficient expedients on hand, e. g., could we not reach this end easier and more perfectly by reason and conscience?

With these and similar arguments J. J. Roussean assailed the belief in revelations one hundred years ago. That his arguments were weighty can be inferred from the fact that the book in which they are communicated (in the Emile) in Paris and Geneva was publicly hurned by the hangman, and that its author could only save his life by his quick flight, Antichrist and Mair Corrected.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

I hav been looking over some of the letters in The Truth Seeker written by Mr. Mair, and am much interested in the correspondence. There is one letter that has escaped me, but it is referred to by "Antichrist" in the number for February 19th. It seems to hav contained a reference to the late Rev. Robert Taylor which was absurdly untrue. It is reproduced in "Antichrist's" letter and is as follows: "He [Mr. Mair] has a book entitled 'Natural History of Religion; or, Youth Armed Against Infidelity and Religious Errors,' and says that it is written by Robt. Taylor author of the 'Diegesis,' after he became reconverted to Christianity. The book is by the Rev. R. Taylor, curate of Hart, in the county of Durham, and author of 'The Key of Knowledge and Nature' (London, 1832)." This statement I desire to show is not true. At the time when this book was published Robert Taylor was undergoing a most cruel punishment in Horsemonger Lane jail. He was tried on an indictment for blasphemy on Monday, July 4, 1831, at the Surrey sessions. This indictment was preferred against him by the Vice Society of London on the information of two of the Society's spies alleging certain sentences (mostly taken from the context) of a discourse delivered on the previous good Friday at the Rotunda in the Blackfriars road, the subject being the crucifixion of Christ. This indictment and the report of the trial as it appeared in the Times newspaper is now before me. It says, "The defendant, in a written defense of great length, and which occupied nearly six hours in the delivery, deprecated in strong language the conduct of the Society for the Suppression of Vice. The Society consisted chiefly of the clergy, who were determined, if they could, on crushing him to the earth. They were, he designated them, a set of priests, who were unable to controvert the tenets which he promulgated, and as an instance of their ignorance they were afraid to come forward and enter into theological discussions with him, he having given a public challenge to the whole of the priests, and had had that challenge placarded at the different colleges in his country, as well as on the continent." The defendant concluded his defense at half past twelve o'clock, the trial having lasted from ten in the morning, and the jury having brought in a verdict of guilty, the court sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of two hundred pounds, and to enter into his own recognizance in the sum of five hundred pounds, and to find two sureties of two hundred and fifty pounds each for the next five years. He served the whole of the two years in jail, and owing to the recognizances was precluded from lecturing on his release. His health was thoroughly broken by his imprisonment, and he died a Freethinker in the year 1844. In 1841 he brought out a second edition of his "Diegesis," a copy of which I hav on my shelves. "Antichrist" is in error in stating that his work was written during his second imprisonment. The "Diegesis" was written during his first imprisonment in Oakham jail, the preface being dated in that prison February, 1829. He wrote a series of most interesting letters to Richard Carlile, during the second imprisonment, which were printed in the Prompter, a weekly journal published by the latter. Carlile, a few months before, had been sentenced to three years' imprisonment in Giltspur street Compter for sedition. If you should think a few selections from these letters of interest to your readers I shall hav pleasure in transcribing them for your paper. It is now fifty years ago since this great man and true suffered martyrdom for religious freedom; will any of your readers celebrate his jubilee on July 4th next? A few of us will in England. Yours for mental liberty,

To Iowa and Other Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you grant me a little space in your valuable paper for a short chat with Iowa and other Liberals?

We are about to open the battle all along the line, and I wish to call your attention to a few facts which are of the utmost importance if we are to make any impression upon our well-provisioned, munitioned, and entrenched foe.

It is utterly impossible for us to do much, if aught, to secure the separation of church and state, that is, to strike the officious hand of ecclesiasticism from the helm of secular government, until we are organized. For more than a year I hav been bending every energy toward the unification and harmonization of apparently conflicting interests and the solidification of our isolated units into a compact and serried mass, ready to be hurled at a moment's notice upon the ranks of caste and citadel of injustice. A greater or less degree of success has attended my efforts and the efforts of those whose assistance alone rendered this success possible, and now it is time to again take counsel together.

On the 28th of last August the Iowa Liberal League was organized, officered, but not provided with a fiscal department. Hence the apparent and comparativ inactivity of the past few months. Until our Constitution was printed and placed in the hands of our county committeemen and township workers, efficient or extensiv local work was out of the question. But our treasury was empty, and for want of a few dollars urgent and important work had to be shoved aside. But I hav finally determined to wait no longer, and ere this reaches the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER the Constitution of the Iowa Liberal League will be in press. I hav undertaken its publication wholly at my own expense, and look to the Liberals of the Hawkeye state to reimburse me for this outlay. Besides the Constitution this pamphlet will contain list of officers, including executiv committee, consisting of one member from each county, sub-committee upon Sunday work and Liberal education, annual bazar, church taxation, list of charter members, officers, of National Liberal League, auxiliary Leagues in Iowa, state committee National Liberal League for Iowa, commentaries upon and elucidation of all the leading provisions of the Constitution from the local organization, articles upon Sunday work, how to conduct Liberal meetings, education of our children, Liberal libraries, the League as a political factor, district, county, township, and neighborhood organization, state convention, church taxation, duties of various officers, how to raise funds, our connection with the National League, etc., etc.

This Constitution will be sent to each officer of the League, state and national, and should be put into the hands of each editor in the state. With this printed and distributed, the way for organized, combined, activ, and effectiv work opens clear before us. Now, how many Iowa Liberals will forward funds to help pay for the printing and distribution of this pamphlet? I hav been compelled to involve myself to get it out and trust that the true Liberals will respond at once. But I am not looking alone to Iowa Liberals for help in this matter.

We think that we adopted a model constitution at Marshalltown last August, and we would like to see it in the hands of thousands of American Liberals. I hav hit upon the plan of selling this pamphlet to such as would like to see what Iowa Freethinkers are doing and are willing to bestow a dime where it will do effectiv service for the cause. One copy, 10 cents; four for 30 cents; sixteen for $1, postpaid. How many will send for it at once? As a Liberal tract and contribution to the literature of Liberalism it is well worth the merely nominal price asked for it. It is as good a missionary document as we hav ever published. To those Liberals I would say that we need stamps to send this pamphlet to those who are entitled to it, to pay for printing, for postage and stationery used in correspondence, to print a church taxation petition for circulation the coming fall, and for other necessary expenses. I giv my time and labor; what will you giv, my comrade? How many want the pamphlet? Address,

Notes from California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The world is moving and mankind is becoming nearer and dearer, no matter what the croakers say. Think of it, the Public Opinion, edited and controled by J. N. Choyinski, a leading Israelite of this city, published in full the whole sermon, or rather lecture, of George Chainey, this week and last week, and gave the distinguished lecturer full credit! The Jewish Times, the leading Jewish journal on this coast, published two columns in last week's issue of your debate with Mr. Mair, and gave you and THE TRUTH SEEKER full credit. The part published was in relation to the immaculate conception likenesses in the alleged birth of Buddha, Christna, and Christ. This is bringing us together. I see you also published leading articles from the Times, which indicates that there is real sympathy between Jews and Freethinkers.

Mr. Jacobs, President of the San Jose and Santa Clara Liberal League, was in the city a few weeks ago looking for speakers in this city to address the League. He was successful in procuring as volunteers Mr. Choyinski and J. L. Hatch, both excellent speakers. The League pays railroad fare and promises a thorough big-hearted Liberal hospitality.

The auxiliary of the National Liberal League in this city is rather inert, though there are thousands of Liberals all about. The officers say they are going to wake up. It is time. They are splendid fellows socially. FREETHINKER.

Elmina's Apology.

Elmina would here inform her numerous inquiring correspondents that the reason why she has not replied to friend Cox's article on "Sexual Intemperance" in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is that she has found that the subject is one so unpopular with the great majority of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that she takes this opportunity of informing them that she will not bore them with any more articles on this subject, although each day's experience and information convinces her that sexual temperance and true continence is the only road to purity, and right generation. All who feel a genuin interest in this all-important subject will find it amply investigated in the Alpha. Address Caroline B. Winslow, editor of the Alpha, No. 1 Grant place, Washinton, D. C. Anthony Comstock and His Work.

The man who poses before the community in the character of a reformer has need to be watchful of his personal conduct lest in forgetting himself he does greater harm than good to the cause he espouses. Whatever the cause, the result is disaster when the man who is its standard-bearer is afflicted with those petty failings that disfigure humanity. Many a worthy enterprise has failed through the weakness of the representativs, when of itself it would perhaps hav stood the test of time and use. As no man is greater than his weakest point, duties should not be imposed upon an individual which are beyond his mental or moral horizon to grasp. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the government, in its effort to suppress certain abuses which hav grown up in the country, selected for its agent a man upon whom the burden is greater than his nature fits him to bear. Anthony Comstock, in pursuit of his work as a special agent of the post-office department, has combined with his duties that of detectiv, and not only that of the detectiv, but that of the spy. Hence he has lowered it in the eyes of the community until were there a popular vote on the subject to-day, not only would Anthony Comstock be retired to obscurity, but the law under which he acts would be abolished. He has made it odious by a system of espionage over the private affairs of individuals which neither the letter nor the spirit of the law warrants. The man is unsuited for the place, and the public service suffers thereby. Ignoring the limit set upon his powers, he plays the part of spy upon business people, and upon men and women whose private affairs he feels himself entitled to investigate, and under the protection of a license he abuses every day he weaves nets about inoffensiv people, and offers decoy letters and bids of a questionable kind to get his intended victims in his toils. Such a system of petty persecution as he indulges in would not be permitted in any autocratic government in the world.

In France, an official who so far transcended his power would be officially decapitated without warning, and an example made of him that would strike terror to the hearts of others of like kind. It is in these free United States alone that a petty official can assume the airs of a potentate, and assert his right to enter the private offices of people, pry into their affairs, and question their emyloyees with a view to discover the carrion for which he seeks, and for which, it is regretfully said, he exhibits such fondness.

Mr. Comstock, by his official course, degrades the law he is appointed to execute. He makes for it enemies of people who otherwise would be glad to help enforce it. But a government that is so weak as to require of its emissaries the performance of such tasks as Anthony Comstock sets for himself to do, and does with such zeal, is not entitled to such respect as this republic should receive from its humblest as well as its highest citizen.

We hope we make plain the distinction between the law and its agent. The same law that Comstock makes so odious to decent people a man fitted for the trust would make odious to evil doers. The quality of Mr. Comstock's mind that unfits him for authority over his fellow-beings is his narrow-mindedness, his mediocrity, his suspicious and malignant disposition.

He goes out to seek treachery and cunning and indecency, and he gets what he seeks. In all his career as the guardian of the postal service we do not remember to hav heard of or read a sentiment that expressed sympathy with the erring, pity for the fallen, or loving tenderness toward the weak. In the godlike qualities he is as barren as he is of ability. In him is developed the vindictiv spirit which makes him delight in tracking wickedness, relentless in prosecuting it.

The spectacle which he has presented on more than a score of occasions as the avenging Nemesis has led the public to look with disfavor upon a law that permits such a representativ. Mr. Comstock as a detectiv is not a credit to the profession; as the agent of this government, whose duty it is to secure the arrest of those who are hurting the morals of the community by the circulation of unclean documents and writings, he is an undeniable failure. He poses well at society meetings, and tells a thrilling story in ministers' studies, but fails utterly and ignominiously as a public servant, whose duty it is to serve the public, not make it a vehicle through which he can work off his superabundance of spleen and vindictivness.

Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference.

We hav the pleasure of announcing that we hav secured as speaker for our next quarterly meeting to be held in Omro, Wis., June 10, 11, and 12, 1881, Cephas B. Lynn, of Boston, one of the finest orators in America. Other speakers invited to participate. Good vocal and instrumental music. The meeting will be called to order Friday, at 10 o'clock, A.M., sharp. So please govern yourselvs accordingly. All lovers of truth invited to participate. The Omro friends will entertain free as far as possible.

WM. M. LOCKWOOD, Pres.
DR. J. C. PHILLIPS, Sec.

MR. JOHN R. KELSO, of Modesto, Cal., will start eastward about the first of June on a lecturing tour, and would like to receive calls to deliver Liberal lectures on his route. He is well qualified to giv satisfaction as an able reasoner, good writer, and an eloquent speaker. Mr. Kelso was formerly a rousing revival preacher in the Methodist church, and afterward a member of Congress. His address is Modesto, Cal. 3t20

THREE considerations serve to indicate with how much caution, with what a large survey of history, with what a wide grasp and deep analysis of the phenomena of mind in various times and among various races, the problem must be approached. Christianity is not the most widely-spread of the religions of the world. Buddhism is of earlier date, and counts more millions among its votaries. Islamism took its rise later, was diffused more rapidly, and rules over a larger area of the earth's surface. At one time it seemed as if Christianity would go down before the triumphant career of the Crescent. Some readers of history may even be disposed to argue that but for two men and two battles—possibly but for a special charge of cavalry, or it may be a sudden inspiration of the leading generals—it might hav done so. The spread of Buddhism, the spread of Islamism, must hav had an adequate cause, as well as the spread of Christianity.—Greg's "Creed of Christendom."

where he did not rise to the dignity and high plain of moral excellence which a real God should occupy.

3. His solemn declaration, "Thou shalt not come out of prison until thou hast paid the last farthing," exhibits a merciless and unforgiving spirit. It is at least very strange for a loving God to utter if it was meant to be literal, and too obscure to instruct if metaphorical.

4. Another case of injustice, as well as a direct falsification of God's word and promise, I will call to your attention, and then close. In what is accepted as God's original law it says, "The father shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin" (Deut. xxiv, 16). This is but a simple provision of justice if men must be put to death at all. It is about as grand and faultless as anything to be found in the Old Testament. But, in direct opposition to this just decree, we find Jesus using this language: "Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute; that the blood of all the prophets which was shed from the foundation of the world may be required of this generation; from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple. Verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation" (Luke xi, 49–51). Here we see that Yahweh in the Old Testament said children should not suffer for the sins of their fathers, but Jesus in the New Testament said that the children of the generation present at that time should suffer for the sins of their fathers, grandfathers, and great-grandfathers all the way back. This is but an additional instance where the spirit of Jesus and the teachings of the New Testament are decidedly worse than those of Yahweh and the Old Testament. The curses and denunciations of the Old Testament were cruel and merciless enough in all conscience, but they pale into insignificance compared with those of Jesus and the New Testament. The curses of Yahweh and the Old Testament were confined solely to this life; they did not disturb the peace beyond the grave, while Jesus and the New Testament consign all who do not and cannot believe on him to inconceivable suffering and torture forever and forever—a thousand times longer than all those nines endlessly multiplied together will last. I think I have given you some idea how cruel and bad a character Yahweh was, but you must admit that the son, notwithstanding his gentleness and usual amiability, was infinitely more merciless and cruel.

But other of his defects and merciless qualities I must defer till another letter. Yours truly,

D. M. B.

The "Free Will" Doctrin.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: An article on the freedom of the human will in your issue of the 5th inst. induces me to make a few remarks concerning that doctrin as it is now understood. If science must take root and hav life in the future we must weed out from all doctrins everything that confounds the understanding, and so I think it is time that the world knew that the term "freedom of the human will" does not include the freedom of the individual. Because the will is free it does not logically follow that man ought to be responsible for his actions so far as future punishment is concerned in the sense of popular theology, because there is a vast difference between the will to do and the power to accomplish. On one hand we hav theology declaring that man can do as he wills, making will and power identical, and on the other we hav science teaching in her inexorable way that will and power do not always work together, and that a man may hav the will to do, but is neither physically nor morally able. What, then, has the freedom of the human will got to do with human accountability in the theological sense? Simply nothing. Viewing the will and the power of man separately, the close investigator will not be long in concluding that the doctrin of human responsibility based on the freedom of the will has no foundation in fact, and so when this foundation-stone of the popular theological edifice is destroyed the whole structure must fall to the ground. The correspondent alluded to in this article, "A.B.B.," believes, as I understand, that "consciousness is the best, nearest, and shortest evidence of truth," and so concludes that because a man is conscious that he is free, he is free. But human consciousness cannot be trusted; it has caused many an innocent soul to be unjustly condemned and punished, and it is as differentiated in its conclusions as the characters in which it dwells. All we hav got to trust to is inductiv science, and by its teachings we shall hav to frame the doctrins of the future whether we will do so or not. Science does not ask us if we will believe; it forces its truths upon us and leaves us no way to deny, and fight as man may against its truths, it will at last come out conqueror, and the doctrin of the freedom of the will, including the power, will be trampled under its feet along with all the other unscientific creations of undeveloped man. JOHN MADDOCK.

Letters from Friends.

ITHACA, N. Y., May 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Draw on me for $5 when you are ready to go on your journey around the world.

Yours respectfully, JAS. MCBRIDE.

OIL CITY, PA., April 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Mark me down for $5 for your trip round the world. Yours truly, LEWIS MILLER.

BRUNSWICK, MO., April 26, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: If you are bound to make that trip round our globe, count on me for $5, but if I could help it I would not let you go. It is a great undertaking. Respectfully I call myself your friend and well-wisher, FRED HECK.

TEMESCAL, CAL., April 17, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: You will find inclosed a post-office order for $8—$3 for my paper till next Christmas, and $5 for the trip round the world.

Yours truly, JOHN GREGORY.

FT. KLAMATH, OR., April 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 subscription due for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Put down ten dollars for your trip round the world—$5 for myself, and $5 for Michael Powell, of Fort Klamath. The money will be remitted as soon as notified. Wishing you success in your undertaking, I remain, Yours truly, SIMON ASKINS.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I presume you find it impossible to resist the pressure of the host who bid you to depart in quest of two of the priceless boons of existence—truth and knowledge. Reluctantly I join in the general request for a trip abroad.

Candidly, I do not like to see you go, but it is more from personal motivs than otherwise.

You seem to hold the position of patriarch to Freethinkers, and toward the last great movement for liberty.

Your fatherly, honest nature has endeared you to me, and I will giv you up regretfully, feeling that should you lose your life owing to your trip, the cause and myself would lose a splendid champion and a loving friend.

In leaving America I desire you to carry with you this expression of my own high regard, not as mine only, but of that of very many others who know you but to honor you for your splendid devotion to principle, and who love you for the sacrifice you made in defying a treasonable law.

I am confident that if you complete the trip in safety, its results will be of incalculable value to humanity.

Mines of priceless truths and facts hav no doubt been covered and hidden by the dirt of Christian bigotry and hate, and who so well fitted to dig them out as the Truth Seeker himself?

Festering pits of moral rottenness of all descriptions, filled to overflowing by Christian domination, no doubt exist, and it needs your clear brain, keen eyes, and faultless pen to put the shames of our boasted civilization before the world.

Yes, by all means go, if you feel equal to the trip; no man living will or can do the great work to be done as well or as completely as you will.

Put the inclosed $10 in your clothes to aid you in the journey, and put me down for ten more, subject to an emergency while abroad, or to aid in setting you "square" on your return.

Promising activ aid to your paper while you are away, and a good wish for every mile of your journey, I remain, in affectionate friendship,

Yours, D. E. RYAN.

[We sincerely thank our friend for his generous donation. This is not the first instance of his generosity in this direction. He is one who can be depended upon to aid the cause of truth in case of emergency. ED. T. S.]

LEADVILLE, COL., April 20, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $3 for subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881. Please excuse me for being a little slow in remitting, but it is better late than never. I call myself one of your old subscribers, as I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last five or six years. I first began to take it when Bro. Chainey was a Methodist minister in Naperville, Ill., and a regular customer of mine in my barber-shop. I used to giv him your paper to read and also Paine's "Age of Reason," as I thought then just for the fun of it, but it brought forth fruit beyond my expectation, which I consider worth the price of a thousand TRUTH SEEKERS.

Now, friend Bennett, if you should decide to make that journey around the globe, as is expected by a great many, I would say put me down for $5. I will remit as soon as you say it's a go. I am also requested to tell you in my letter to put down E. W. Ongon and B. F. Rice for $5 each, which they say they will send as soon as you say it's a go.

Your friend, JOSEPH HENRY.

ARLAND, MICH., April 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $6 for a renewal of subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for my friend George Woolley and myself, to be sent to the above-named post-office.

If you want to thank any one for patronage from this place, you can giv it to Comstock, as he was the cause of our taking your paper. I hav been taking the Investigator for about twenty years, and hav not felt able to take another until aroused by your persecution, which is probably the case with many others.

In regard to your trip round the world, if made, count on me for one. I see the friends hav spoken for most of the evidences of our holy religion, so I shall only lay claim to those locks that were sheared from Samson, as I believe they hav not been spoken for; and if you deliver them to me I shall surely giv you one-tenth for your trouble, a la Jacob.

Yours, F. ELMER.

BISMARCK, DAK. TER., May 2, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been reading, thinking, and studying ever since that suggestion came from a friend in California. I thought at first that you ought not to go, but I hav changed my mind considerably, and now think you will hav to go. You may call on me for $5, for I must hav the books. You hav my best wishes, etc. Would pray for you, but I hav given that up long before this as a useless ceremony.

Hav just finished reading "The Darwins," by Mrs. E. D. Slenker. It is the best story I ever read in my life. Had to laugh when she was going for the dogs. It is something everybody should read, for dogs are a nuisance, and there are so many of so many different kinds that are worse than useless, and it costs as much to feed a dog as a chiid, still they will feed them and let their children go hungry and naked. Then she goes for the tobacco-chewer, smoker, and snuffer in good shape. She is doing a noble work. Would that there were more like her!

Yours for truth, S. G. SHARPLESS.

DARLINGTON, WIS., April 10, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I tell you it is hard times out here in Wisconsin—the hardest winter I ever saw. There are two feet of snow on the ground now in the timber, and it is snowing while I write, and blowing hard from the northeast. There are no less than thirteen persons within two miles of my place that hav died in the last two months, and many more are sick. The priest and the doctor hav been kept very busy, and I think that is the main cause of so many deaths.

It is enough to make a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S blood boil to see the ignorance that abounds amongst these priest-ridden slaves. With quacks to doctor the body and priests to doctor the soul, the poor victims are in danger of losing both. I hav loaned THE TRUTH SEEKER to some of my Irish neighbors whom I thought were capable of being trusted to read it, thinking it would be the means of opening their eyes; but alas! they return me the paper saying they do not wish to read a paper so full of lies; but to them a lie is the truth and the truth s a lie. They believe a lie in order that they may not be damned, and they would rather be damned than believe the truth.

I am with you on the round-the-world trip.

Yours truly, JAMES LEACH.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., April 22, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: When I discovered the boom for your encircling the world expanding, I requested to be counted in for $5, to be paid as soon as you had determined to make the voyage, with the understanding that the $5 was not to apply on the book, which I shall pay for on delivery, because I consider it a privilege and a pleasure to contribute for the increase of the happiness of one who has labored so long and successfully for the enlightenment and happiness of his fellow-men, persevering against all odds and opposition and suffering almost unto death. Truly you deserve relief from the eight years of unremitting labor you hav given the world. I hav said it would be a pleasure to contribute to increase your happiness. Your desire to make the journey has already cropped out without a declaration to that effect.

You asked my opinion of the "Elements of Social Science," for sale at your office. I pronounce it the grandest thing ever published on that subject, and unhesitatingly say that the world's society and civilization would be vastly improved and made happier were the knowledge it contains in the possession of every adult person in the world. I hav said it was grand. It is true, it is strictly scientific, and in harmony with the imperious laws of nature. And had your usefulness been limited to a general introduction of this valuable work only, you would hav richly earned the title of benefactor. Every person loving humanity and not wedded to that cherished principle of the church, that ignorance is bliss and it is folly to be wise, should be made wiser, happier, and more useful by reading it.

My kindest regards to Mrs. Bennett; and be assured, my dear friends, the cherished hope of having the pleasure of meeting you both not distant in the future is one of the rich gems of life.

Respectfully and truly your friend, D. R. BURT.

BOSTON, MASS., May 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I saw your editorial on the different papers that hav been ruled out by the post-office department. The only allusions I hav ever made to Comstock are the ones I inclose, taken from the February number. It was on this number that the department ruled. For fear of offending my subscribers, I hav never expressed any unpopular opinions in my paper. The more I think of it the more I am convinced that Comstock had something to do with this trouble, although I did not think so at first. I am glad to see that you hav the courage to speak out so bravely and boldly against these high-handed and arbitrary proceedings, and I hope that the Liberals of the country will continue to agitate this subject until the Comstock dynasty is completely overthrown. Your friend,

JAMES W. STILLMAN, Pub. Agent's Advocate.

NORD, CAL., April 2, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I received the Physiologist this morning. After a candid perusal, I couldn't come to any other conclusion, as no TRUTH SEEKER reader ought to, than that the noble work of Sara B. Chase and Elmina D. Slenker should be combined with your own. Both papers read and studied in every household would do more good to mankind than all the howling and bawling of the Turks, the grunting of the Jews, and the psalm-singing and sniveling of all the Christians who ever lived.

Mrs. Slenker is devoting herself altogether to the improvement of mankind, and such an effort ought not to be overlooked by the Liberals of this country. Liberals, you all hav a dollar and a half to spare. Send it to Snowville and help our noble Elmina. When the world came to the conclusion that men were the noblest work of God, such women as Sara and Elmina could not hav been in existence. THE TRUTH SEEKER and Physiologist together will prevent anybody from committing crimes.

Yours fraternally, E. W. FITZNER.

[It is a gross outrage that such a valuable paper should be stopped and crushed to the earth by a bigoted public servant, and without the least show of law or right.—ED. T. S.]

AUBURN, N. Y., May 2, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I inclose you post-office order for $1.75—$1.50 to pay for your recent voluminous production, "An Infidel Abroad," which please send me by return mail; the remaining twenty-five cents to go toward repairing Paine's monument. If sufficient funds hav already been raised for the above purpose please apply it toward improving the ground, etc. Though a small amount, I want it to go toward some good Liberal cause. I will now wait for the "Infidel Abroad." I hav once read its contents in the columns of your paper, and, having a little leisure time just now, I want to read it more thoroughly in its present beautiful form and under its present title. I am constantly adding your valuable works to my library. I thirst for knowledge.

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

P. S.—Will the Bennett-Mair Discussion be published in book form? Are you not, though a disbeliever in miracles, working a miracle in the above discussion? Aside from your regular journalizing, it is wonderful how you find time to conduct such an important discussion and produce such unanswerable arguments. How do you, how can you, get in possession of such profound learning? Yet in all your successful efforts, I too do not believe there is any miracle about it. It is through energy, perseverance, determination, resoluteness, coupled with talent, reason, thought, and action with which nature has endowed you that you are thus enabled to succeed in such wonderful accomplishments. It is all natural, nothing supernatural nor miraculous about it. Truth impels you onward and upward. L. D. G.

[The discussion with Mr. Mair will be published in book form soon after it is completed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which will be in a few weeks. Will those who wish a copy please indicate the fact? It will contain some seven hundred pages. Price, $1.50.—ED. T. S.]

WHITEHALL, MICH., April 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As my time was out the first of this month, you will find inclosed $3 for another year's subscription to keep the machine moving. Keep pegging away; you are doing well, yea, very well. The humble followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene tried hard to kill you, but you don't die worth a cent. You are still worth a whole regiment of dead men, at least so far as we are able to discover from our present standpoint.

What is the matter with Comstock? Are the Infidels dead? or are there no gudgeons around to bite, or is he out of bait? He ought to patronize his dear Uncle Sam a little by sending occasionally a decoy letter to some skeptical cuss. I see, by the way, that he has been up to Albany to try to charter the Legislature for the benefit of himself and his Vice Society, but hav not learned whether he was as successful as he was in chartering the United States Congress in 1873 or not. I see, also, that Wakeman was on his track, and I think Comstock must hav writhed a little under the rasping he gave him. I do not know as I would advise him to do as some say Judas did, go and hang himself; but when he dies, if I had the conducting of his funeral, I would hand him over to my Quaker brethren, that he might be buried in silence on some lonely island where the most loathsome reptil that crawls upon the banks of Pandemonium comes up every thousand years to eat the putrid carcasses of the damned. And I am not certain but they would turn up their noses with disgust and leave him there to rot. N. F. STRONG.

PIEDRA, COL., April 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT AND OTHER LIBERAL FRIENDS: After a long silence, during which I have passed through some very important changes, I embrace an opportunity to speak a word to you again through the friendly columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Since meeting last I hav united my destiny to that of one of the purest and truest Liberal young ladies in all the land, Miss R. W. Little, formerly of New Albany, Ind., and since our acquaintance was brought about by a communication in the friendly column, I thought it meet and proper to announce the happy event of our marriage through the same. Perhaps other good Liberals may be made known and brought together by the same means. If so, then will the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER hav added to the laurels of its good works. I hav drawn a prize and am willing to share it with the editor and all the good, kind people who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, for whilst she loves me with a certain exclusivness, she loves all good Liberals everywhere.

We are endeavoring to spread the light away out here on the frontier, and think we hav been instrumental in opening the eyes of some with whom we hav come in contact with. Last night we had three good Infidels stay over night with us. I remarked that such a thing as five Infidels coming together without a Christian to mar our pleasure had never happened at our house before.

This western country affords a good field for the missionary, as we hav few churches and fewer priests to make afraid by pointing their finger at their distorted image of death and otherwise browbeating us, so that Liberal literature of a plain and simple character would, if distributed, be a source of much good.

My little wife joins me in kind regards to the good editor and wife and all the dear readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Fraternally, J. ALLEN EVANS.

MONTAGUE, TEXAS, April 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER appears every week, freighted with rich things. I would feel lost without it. I hav thought of your trip round the world much in the same light that my old friend Cook, of Kansas, does. My friend Moore, of Adrian, Michigan, made some truthful remarks on the temperance question, and T. C. Leland on organization. Wakeman's speech on the Comstock laws is the best thing I hav read. Such intellectual giants should be kept in the field battering down the walls of superstition. The letters to Mair are rich. Mair must be getting short of ammunition. I should like to be one of the number to help you round the world, but shall not be able unless the time is delayed; but I shall want the book when it comes out.

I am doing what I can to circulate Liberal books and papers, and will get some subscribers after a while. Money is scarce, and most of the people are poor, ignorant, and superstitious. It is a hard place to introduce Liberalism. The country is being settled fast, and many Liberals will come in. We are going to hav a railroad, and intelligence always follows in such a country.

My wife sits at my elbow and says: "Tell Bro. Bennett not to go round the world for a while yet. The time may come when it might be best to go." We can hardly spare you for a while, there is so much to do at home. You asked the opinions of the friends, and so I hav cast in my mite with the rest,

Yours truly, GEO. W. CARPENTER.

LIBERAL, MO., May 1, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Thinking a few plain statements of our condition, our needs, and our aspiration as a colony or town might be of interest to you, I will try to make it so. We hav both agricultural and mineral resources that but few excel. We hav coal, iron, zinc, and perhaps silver. We hav a fine climate, healthy and invigorating atmosphere, and good water. We hav an excellent wheat-growing country, plenty of excellent fruits, etc.

We need more Liberals to come and liv with us and build up a brotherhood that shall know no distinction in mankind but that of moral action. We want live Liberals and none but Liberals. We want an expression of sympathy and feeling to encourage us. We want good, short articles for our paper. We want donations to our library (of which you, Mr. Editor, hav set so noble an example), and a co-operation of feeling and interest from every Liberal in the land. We want all the Liberals in the world to write to us and giv anything they can, from a word of encouragement to a liberal donation. This is the only town in America devoted to Liberalism and humanity, and the Liberals of America should make it a grand success, and not let the churches choke us out of existence.

We hope to build up a town or society that shall be dedicated to the best and purest thought of the age. We hope to inaugurate a movement that will blend all into one brotherhood and cement the hearts of mankind in one grand effort to commence a heaven upon earth that we can see and feel the realization of.

We hope to do more in two years to benefit mankind than any church has done in eighteeen hundred years of experience and effort. We hope to put to shame those who hav only prayed for a heaven among the clouds by instituting upon the earth a heaven good enough for anybody. Liberals, giv us your encouragement. FRANK M. BAKER.

HALIFAX, PA., April 24, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav a startling announcement to make. I had a communication from the devil, my old friend, whom I had lost sight of for several years, but to my astonishment, his majesty turned up, and said: "You know our mutual friend Bennett is contemplating a journey around the world. That is a Christian scheme, and I am at the head of it. You know that this Bennett is raising general h—l in the Christian church, and is opening the eyes of the people to such an extent that my kingdom is suffering for want of recruits; ignorance alone can keep up my kingdom. When people become thoroughly enlightened my business is at an end, inasmuch as nearly all my recruits come from the churches. I conceived the idea to head the movement by putting Bennett out of the way, and then looked around for aids. I soon found one Colgate, a soapy man, one Comstock, a character unfit to associate with decent people, one Britton, a cuss, and a judicial Benedict Arnold; with these co-workers I proceeded to business, and after a protracted struggle we had this Bennett caged in the Albany bastile, as we firmly believed, to ruin him and his paper forever, but imagin our discomfiture when no sooner was he there than he commenced his book called the "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," which not only raised hell in our camp again but put him on his feet as a martyr and hero, and put his paper on a more flourishing basis than ever, so we concluded to send him to the old world, and sink the ship, but she didn't sink. Even on his way to Europe he commenced writing a series of letters for his paper, which to our utter chagrin took like fire in a tinder box and culminated in a book called "An Infidel Abroad," which is read by thousands, and is an eye-opener. So as another resort to kill this enemy to my business, I went about among his friends, in spirit (I am a Spiritualist by necessity), and infused the idea into their minds to raise a few thousand dollars (the Christians' god) to send him around the world, and it looks as if we would succeed in getting the cash and starting him off. I hav been over the route already, as you know spirits can travel at will. I hav picked out a cannibal of great physical power, whose jaws are already opening to put him forever out of sight. My friend, this is confidential; in a few weeks I will call upon you again and relate my travels and doings among the great lights of Spiritualism, as you will remember how in Cincinnati, Ohio, in the winter of '71, I spoke through you to a delighted company at the house of Mrs. Dr. Dicks in Barr street, when I announced myself as Humboldt, through a medium, but you detected me. I hav been at that business ever since."

Yours from his satanic majesty, CHAS. YOKLE.

HARWICH, MASS., April 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I don't wish to flatter, Mr. Bennett, but THE TRUTH SEEKER, to me, has come to be the best paper, by far, that I know of, and the one altogether indispensable. I try, occasionally, to get you subscribers, but the cry is, "I take too many papers already." But "if nothing breaks," I will get one before next Thanksgiving day.

I wish, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, to thank T. B. Wakeman for his "Address before the Committee on Charitable and Religious Societies." I hope that odious Comstock law will be wiped out before long, and its contemptible agent remanded to private life, and his name be handed down to posterity as one of the plagues to be guarded against in the future. Yes, wipe it out, and let the common law take care of obscenity, as it does of other and greater crimes.

Oh, I am glad and proud of the array of able men who are engaged in the good work of reform! We "smaller fry" are not altogether without appreciation of the mighty work being done by the Bennetts, the Wakemans, the Pillsburys, the Ingersolls, the Lelands, the—well, the hosts of giants that are doing battle for the right.

As to your going round the little planet, I don't know what to say. If I were sure of your getting back safe and sound I would say, Yes, go; but taking into account the perils you may be called to encounter—for it is a long way round—I am not without apprehensions for your safety. Yours, etc.,

B. F. ROBBINS.

I THINK "The Darwins" is far superior to "John's Way," but both do good service for the cause intended. G. W. WALKER.

Death of Absalom.

BY ALHAZA.

"Oh, leave me alone, with my ghastly wounds bleeding!
In this dim, dreary wood let my life pass away!
How dread is the silence! a wierd form is passing—
I hav seen him before when the morning was gray.

"My requiem he chants in this wild, bloody forest,
He presses a crown on my poor frozen brow:"
"I hav watched thee, bright prince, thou shalt die in thy beauty,
Bold heroes are waiting to welcome thee now.

"Thou hast lived in two worlds; one was ghastly and gory.
While thy red-handed father was wading through blood,
And thou wert with us, writing history's glory,
And hastening with chariots to stay the dark flood.

"Thou hast plead for the poor, and the orphan hath blessed thee,
Thy youth's wildest deeds only cast a foul stain
On the father who set thee the vilest example
That was known since the days of the murderer Cain.

"Ahithophel wept for his kinsman, Bathsheba,
Her beauty defiled in the harem's dark shade;
He hated the deeds of the robber and tyrant
Who ruined the earth with the wrecks that he made.

"But thy dark, crafty parent hath quenched all thy splendor;
Pale, beautiful statue, lament not thy fate;
Far better the ghostly, dim land of the shadow
Than a cockatrice den with its malice and hate."

"Support me, wierd shape; in my strength I am dying;
Before me I see the bright home of my youth;
More human than man, blessed spirit receive me,
Wild Absalom dieth a friend to the truth.

"Dark forms I hav seen when the world was in slumber;
They brandish their wands while the centuries roll;
The nations sleep on, all their glory forgotten,
And withered the freedom, the life of the soul.

"Awake, sleeping man, I hav fought to defend thee;
I die not a slave to a priest or a king;
Thou dark moaning forest, my sleep shall be holy,
'Neath wild, howling storm or the sweetness of spring."

Pale forms hover near—by his grave they are weeping;
They worshiped his courage, his love, and his ire;
They scatter pale blossoms where cold lies his beauty,
The brow of the hero, the bosom of fire.

To The Medical Monitor.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Fools think that they can crush the living word,
That idiot noise can keep the truth unheard;
That they can hem the restless mind of man,
That their small virtue can all progress ban.
So, like the pigmy on the Alps sublime,
Clothed with official garments for the time,
They shriek their petty edicts on the air,
And think that God Almighty thunders there.
A fool is bad enough; but when that fool,
By fortune's wondrous freak, is made to rule,
What hights of folly then he will attain,
What antic efforts some bad end to gain!
The truth, they say, is ever in a well,
Which means that in low places it doth dwell,
And not in high; and this indeed we know:
It seldom glitters on a ruler's brow.
The higher up we get in ranks of men,
The farther off is wisdom from our ken.
Poor fools! they think they've crushed that little sheet,
The Physiologist, so brave and sweet,
And beaming with the light of better day,
When "Fewer Children" shall hav ampler play;
When man by reason shall hav conquered life,
And music flows where now there is but strife;
When knowledge shall the body shrine like soul.
And both be nourished for the perfect whole.
They think that they hav crushed our genial friend
And brought her to a most untimely end,
And buried her from sight forevermore;
And lo! she comes more potent than before,
A monitor to float the sea of time,
To thunder forth defiance 'gainst the crime
That strips the human being of his right
To pour his clearest thought to vivid light.
The fools shall find that they hav cursed themselvs
And put their own stupidity on shelves,
There to remain a mongrel show for aye,
While what they thought to kill will rise like day,
And still make less the misery of man,
Still sweep to victory despite their ban.
Flame forth, O Monitor, with voice elate;
With thee is all the glory of man's fate.
The fire of nature and the might of truth;
The life that crowns the world with endless youth.
Thy lightest beam is still a spear most great
To crush the mightiest evil of the state.
Smile at thy foes; they can but hurt thy skin,
They cannot pierce the mighty life within.
They can but prison thee and crucify;
Tomb thee they may, but angels of the sky—
Angels of knowledge, science, art—shall fly
To lift the stone and set thee free as heaven.
Bold bark, by winds of endless progress driven,
Thou still shalt plow the open sea of thought;
Thy sail shall glitter by no pirate caught.
And when the Monitor shall reach the crest,
Bounding to fortune, by no foe oppressed,
Then shall we know its soul is still the same
Fools thought they'd buried with its former name.
The Physiologist shall liv complete;
The rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

A number of cities are about to adopt the electric lights so that the people can see where the city gas lamps are at night.

RELIGION

AS REVEALED BY THE

Material and Spiritual Universe.

(ILLUSTRATED.)

By Edwin D. Babbitt.

It treats of the Existence and General Character of God, God as a Spirit, the Nature of God, Creeds and Practices of Christianity, The Dangers of Infallible Standards, The Christian Bible Tested, Religions Tested by their Fruits, Life and Death Under the Old Religions, Life and Death Under a Spiritual Religion, The Future Religion.

The book is a scientific, philosophical treatis upon the above and other subjects, by a thorough scholar. He is widely known by his "Principles of Light and Color," "Health Manual," etc., and this new book is sure to be read with even greater interest than those.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT DOCTOR FELLOWS

Your Case Carefully! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Important to Invalids. The Most Marvelous Invention in the World

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING

IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.

Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.

Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.

Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.

Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.

NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the pfivileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the followiug soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence wich which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people ook up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DET. TRUAX,

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earuestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pain lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them wheuever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. MRS. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years standing And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR

THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

THE solemn league and covenant
Cost Scotland blood, cost Scotland tears;
But it sealed freedom's sacred cause;
If thou'rt a slave indulge thy sneers.—Burns.

WHAT is incredible to thee thou shalt not, at thy peril, at thy soul's peril, attempt to believe! Elsewhere for a refuge or die here! Go to perdition if thou must, but not with a lie in thy mouth; by the Eternal Maker, no!—Carlyle's Sterling.

WHAT stronger breast-plate than a heart untainted?
Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just;
And he but naked, though locked up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.

BUT is it not some reproach on the economy of Providence that such a one, who is a mean, dirty fellow, should hav amassed wealth enough to buy half a nation? Not in the least. He made himself a mean, dirty fellow for that very end. He has paid his health, his conscience, his liberty for it; and will you envy him his bargain?—Mrs. Barbauld.

I ACCEPT as the fundamental principle of human relations, and of all science concerning them, the great Christian doctrin that "we are every one members one of another." As a consequence of the doctrin I hold that the wealth of mankind is morally a common store; that we are morally bound to increase it as much and to waste it as little as we can.—Goldwin Smith.

BUT sometimes virtue starves while vice is fed:
What then? Is the reward of virtue bread?
That vice may merit; 'tis the price of toil;
The knave deserves it when he tills the soil.
The good man may be weak, be indolent;
Nor is his claim to plenty, but content.
What nothing earthly givs, or can destroy,
The soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy
Is virtue's prize. —Pope's Essay on Man.

BE and continue poor, young man, while others around you grow rich by fraud and disloyalty; be without place or power, while others beg their way upward; bear the pain of disappointed hopes while others gain the accomplishment of theirs by flattery; forego the gracious pressure of the hand, for which others cringe and crawl. Wrap yourself in your own virtue, and seek a friend and your own daily bread. If you hav in such a course grown gray with unbleached honor, bless your fortune and die.—Emerson.

THOU must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow
If thou another soul wouldst reach.
It needs the overflowing heart
To giv the lips full speech.
Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famin feed;
Speak truly, and thy word
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Liv truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed. — Horatius Bowers.

AND to you, Christians, I would say: Fight Freethought if you will; oppose Atheism if you deem it false and injurious to humanity; strike at us with all your strength on the religious platform; it is your right, nay, it is even your duty; but do not seek to answer our questions by blows from the statute book, nor to check our search after truth by the arm of the law. I impeach these laws against Infidels at the bar of public opinion, as an infraction of the just liberty of the individual, as an insult to the dignity of the citizen, as an outrage on the sacred rights of conscience.—Mrs. Besant's Civil and Religious Liberty.

TENDER spirits offended, like Uncle Toby, at the notion that even the worst of beings should be damned to all eternity, hav simply refused to accept the notion of endless tortures. Thinkers, aiming at a system of abstract justice, hav sought to prove that it could not be. Theologians hav contrived all sorts of shifts to dispense with the necessity of believing it. Modern feeling, whether on grounds of logic or of sentiment, has gradually come to suppress it more and more as an inconvenient article in the nominal creed, to be, if not consciously ejected, at least instinctivly thrust as much as possible out of sight. There has resulted an idea of the deity in which the harsher elements are swept away and the gentler ones, such as his fatherhood, his care, and his love, are left behind. Such writers as Theodore Parker, F. W. Newman, and Miss F. P. Cobbe hav carried this ideal to the highest point of perfection of which it appears to be capable. Their God is still the God of Christendom, but refined, purified, and exalted.—Amberley.

I DO think it is real mean of Christians to get up such falsehoods about Infidels as they do in the pulpit and in their pious papers. They turn and twist the most innocent actions of good men, and then color them up and add untruth here and there till an awful crime against morality is made to appear; then it is tracted, preached up, and fulminated from every church organ in the country. It does seem hard that a man must be made to appear vile and criminal simply because he cannot believe what to him seems incredible. And if we Infidels go to work and hunt up evidences, proofs, and facts, and kill all these scandals dead, it will be but a few years, or may be months, ere they are again resurrected by some one who is more zealous than wise or scrupulous, and again the story is published and sent on its rounds, only to be again refuted, nailed, and killed. There are few living Infidels who hav not suffered from misrepresentation and wilful slander, but they can liv it down, or bring living witnesses of its falsehood, while our dead heroes must hav their bright records stained, tarnished, and blurred all over with foul slimes and we able to do so little to defend them. The pulpit has aptly been called the "coward's castle." And pious publications know too well that Infidel defense once admitted to their columns few chances would be left for sensational incidents concerning Infidels; and they realize also that hell destroyed, and Infidels really moral, would knock the props from under godology at once.—Elmina D. Slenker.

HOSE, ANNA.

Anna looked so nice and pretty,
She talked so gay and witty,
That it seemed a real pity
For her to step on a piece of gritty,
Horrid, hateful old banana peel,
And heavenward toss each dainty heel,
For well she knew, as up they flew
(Although the view was seen by few),
That as they rose
A hole in her hose
Was seen by both her rival beaux.

ON the way to Terre Haute a traveler with the air and appearance of a man who knew it all approached the fat passenger and said, in the shocked tones of a man of finer feelings:

"Wasn't it dreadful?"

"I should say it was," the fat passenger replied.

"Did you hear about it?" the traveler continued more impressivly than ever.

"I saw it," the fat passenger replied, even more impressivly.

There was an awkward silence of several minutes between them, and the traveler went back to his seat with a discouraged expression. Presently he came forward and approached the tall, thin passenger.

"Sir," he said, "did you know they were taking up a collection for his family?"

"I should pause to hesitate," said the tall, thin passenger. "I headed the list with a ten-dollar note myself."

The smart traveler's countenance dropped, but he spoke still hopefully:

"Ah, you heard of the sad circumstance, then?"

"Heard of it?" exclaimed the tall, thin passenger. "I was mixed up in it all the way through."

The smart traveler sighed and once more resumed his seat. His face brightened up after a while, and he came to the front once more, laying his hand softly on the arm of the sad passenger.

"Sir," he said, "did you know the train ran over a man at the last station?"

"He was my only brother," said the sad passenger, in a hushed murmur. And then he bent his head forward and covered his face with his hands.

The smart traveler looked really distressed. But he rallied by and by, and, in a last determined effort, he approached the man on the wood-box. Assuming an expression of most intense horror he said:

"Pitiful heavens! I am faint with fear and horror yet. Did you know the train struck a man on that bridge and tore him to pieces?"

The man on the wood-box leaned forward, shaded his mouth with his hand, and said, in a thrilling whisper that went hissing down the car:

"'Sh! Don't giv it away, but I am the man!"

It seemed to be about time to close the lodge.—Hawkeye.

Notes and Clippings.

ISN'T there a seeming incongruousness in describing a total abstinence lecturer as at work in the moral vinyard?

THE fulfilment of Zadkiel's prophecy that the czar of Russia would be slain in March has given a wonderful impulse to the sale of the almanac.

THE Rev. R. Heber Newton has discovered that the teapot makes drunkards, and the Rev. Dr. Van Dyke has discovered that the modern church fair, with raffles and grab-bags attached, makes gamblers.

THE number of deaths recorded last week in this city was just double the number of births, the former being 822 and the latter 411. Should this ratio keep on long, only the vast immigration could prevent the city from retrograding rapidly in population.

WHILE Christian missions report a gain of less than twenty thousand converts in China during the year 1880, Mohammedanism counts one hundred thousand. The whole Christian population of China is estimated at four in one hundred thousand. In this country one person in every six is a church-member.

ANOTHER black eye for St. Anthony. His bill, giving himself and his society additional powers, has been adversely reported in the House, so that now we can make up our minds t hat St. Anthony will return here a sadder and madder man than ever, but we fear no wiser. This bill was a dangerous attack on our liberties any how, and it is good for everybody that it is dead.—Truth.

PRESIDENT HARASZTHY of the California State Board of Viticultural Commissioners reports that the present value of vinyards in the state is about $35,000,000, the income from which amounted last year to $3,500,000. He is of the opinion that within three years the vinyards will be yielding to their owners $5,000,000 a year, or ten per cent on $50,000,000 valuation.

THE pastor of the Delphi, N. Y., Episcopal church, the Rev. Dr. Rogers, has been invited to resign. The trouble between him and his parishioners, which began when the funeral services of the church were denied the late Gen. Payne, is on the increase, and an informal request has been made by the vestry, with only one dissenting vote, that the pastoral relation be dissolved.

THE absence of any clergyman, priest, or rabbi at Lord Beaconsfield's death-bed seems to hav seriously disturbed the Irish papers. One of them, the Nation, says: "Priest or parson, book or prayer, cross or crescent, symbol or sign of faith, there was nothing to tell whether the dying man thought of Moses, of Mohammed, or of Christ. Unless the published narrativs omit some very important particulars, Lord Beaconsfield died as dies a horse."

THE appointment of women as postmistresses and their election as members of school committees hav been familiar for many years. Now the governor of Indiana enlarges the list of their public functions by making them notaries public. There is good reason to believe that, with the progress of years, women will fairly divide with men the various office duties of public station, just as now they enter into many of the trades and into all of the professions.

PROFESSOR RUSSELL has been removed from the faculty of Cornell University because he refused to invite Beecher to preach in the chapel. The professor felt that Beecher was a bold, bad man, and that his presence and speaking would hav a demoralizing effect upon the students. The trustees, however, felt differently, and so gave Mr. Russell the g. b. The ex-professor will be respected more than the whole board of trustees, however, by intelligent people.

INGERSOLL says he will hav nothing more to do with politics. He is wrong, if we may judge from his success. For years he has been working for one purpose—to get Jim Blaine President. Well, Jim Blaine is President. What more does Bob Ingersoll want?—Truth. There are thinking people who entertain the opinion that it would hav been better for Ingersoll, as well as for the nation at large, if he had done considerably less in politics than he has in the last few years.

ON a recent Sunday Mr. J. B. Gibbs, the well-known Alderney Dairy man, was in a temperance restaurant in another city when one of the Salvation Army commenced talking to him about Jesus. Mr. Gibbs believes in a practical religion, and he asked the man of the Salvation Army, if he loved Jesus so well, what he was smoking that old pipe for. To which he replied, "I learned to smoke for the toothache." Looking into his mouth and discovering that he was toothless, Gibbs asked him, "Why don't you quit smoking now you havn't got any teeth?" The man kept on smoking, but stopped talking about Jesus.—Paterson Home Journal.

THE czar's reactionary manifesto bodes ill for Russia and for himself. That a modern nation will sink back unresistingly into lower depths of despotism is incredible; and hence this proclamation and the accompanying resignation of the Liberal ministry may turn out to be disastrous for czarism, since the eyes of Liberals will be opened to the hopelessness of dealing with autocrats who learn nothing even from the most terrible experiences. Instead of postponing the cause of constitutional freedom in Russia, by a compromise which might after all hav given up very little, the new czar has challenged the intelligence and conscience of the Russian nation.

MR. TENNEY, a bigoted but discomtfied citizen of Washington, in a letter addressed to the commissioners of the district, a few days ago, made inquiry as to whether there was not some provision of law which would prevent Col. Ingersoll from lecturing on Sunday. The commissioners referred the letter to District Attorney Riddle, who has just delivered an opinion of some length, which concludes as follows: "It would seem that Mr. Tenney will be obliged to suffer the inconvenience and loss worked by the present laws until Congress goes to his relief. In the mean time the labors of Mr. Ingersoll and all others in the fields of science, morals, and philosophy must remain under the general supervision of intelligent public opinion, aided by the criticism of an enlightened press."

THE Sun in speaking of the decreasing numbers of Presbyterian clergymen says: "The small number of students in the Presbyterian theological seminaries, and their indisposition to sacrifice themselvs for the cause, seem to show that the denomination is growing cold and formal, that its faith needs revivifying, and its zeal to be kindled anew. The great number of vacant pulpits suggests also that it is losing its hold on the people, for if they felt the need of the teaching would they be content to get along without teachers? Perhaps, however, the Presbyterians are spending their efforts on too small timber in their divinity schools. Unless these seminaries turn out the right sort of ministers, the smaller the number of their graduates the better it is for the denomination, for faith needs strong defenders in these days."

THE Rev. George O. Barnes, the Kentucky revivalist, seems to be turning that state religiously upside down and inside out. He is holding a series of religious revivals that exceed in excitement anything ever before experienced in that part of the country. He is a Methodist, but holds some doctrins not common in Methodism. One of these is that any person may, by becoming holy enough, escape death and be taken up alive to heaven. He declares that he will make such an ascension within five years. He promises salvation to all his converts, regardless of possible backslidings, and declares that those who remain faithful will receive crowns of glory, while extraordinary piety and zeal will add stars to the crown. The Kentucky pastors, as a rule, do not co-operate with him, and some of them denounce him as an impostor or lunatic; but the multitude follow him and he preaches to great assemblages. Marvelous stories are told of his cures by faith, and some of his followers hav established a hospital, called Pink Cottage, where patients who giv evidence of a suitable amount of faith are received for purely religious treatment. It would almost seem, according to this, that another Jesus has visited the earth. The first one acted as strangely as this one; he effected cures in a similar manner, and was equally unpopular with the priests of his time.

THE GOSPEL OF SENSATION.

The gospel that subsists by show
  Is useful in its generation,
And many sinners gladly go
  To hear the gospel of sensation.

The sleepy shepherds they forsake,
  So orthodox, but so lymphatic,
Preferring to be kept awake
  By ways and methods acrobatic.

True, if the preacher be a clown,
  A tumbler, or a bareback rider,
The church must try to put him down
  For fear of ills that may betide her.

From every bout, like Jack-in-the-box,
  Triumphantly the man emerges,
And draws from other folds the flocks
  To hear the Brooklyn Boanerges.

They giv him laughter and applause,
  Shaking the house from roof to flooring;
So he may truly say he draws,
  And that his hearers do no snoring.

In days of doubt and questioning,
  When oft its hold religion loses,
Success in life is everything,
  And each man pays for what he chooses.

Then to a pulpit acrobat
  One givs a share of admiration;
For Talmage he throws up his hat,
  And hails the gospel of sensation.

IN an interview a few days ago Col. Ingersoll was asked if he thought that orthodox people still believed in the old doctrin of eternal punishment, to which question he gave the following answer: "I am afraid that the old idea is dying out, and that many Christians are slowly giving up the consolations naturally springing from the old belief. Another terrible blow to the old infamy is the fact that in the revised New Testament the consoling word hell has been left out. I am informed that in the revised New Testament the word hades has been substituted. As nobody knows exactly what hades means, it will not be quite so easy to frighten people at revivals by threatening them with something that they don't clearly understand. After this when the impassioned orator cries out that all the unconverted will be sent to hades, the poor sinners, instead of getting frightened, will begin to ask each other what and where that is. It will take many years of preaching to clothe that word in all the terrors and horrors, pains and penalties and pangs, of hell. Hades is a compromise. It is a concession to the philosophy of our day. It is a graceful acknowledgment to the growing spirit of investigation that hell, after all, is a barbaric mistake. Hades is the death of revivals. It cannot be used in song. It won't rhyme with anything with the same force that hell does. It is altogether more shadowy than hot. It is not associated with brimstone and flame. It sounds somewhat indistinct, somewhat lonesome, a little desolate, but not altogether uncomfortable. For revival purposes it is simply useless, and few conversions will be made in the old way under the revised Testament."

"A Hater of Shams" Discourses about the Declaration of Independence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Sir: I hav been not a little amused, I confess, but more surprised, at the long wrangle between our friend W. H. Burr, and others, on one side, and Underwood and company on the other, over the question of the authorship of the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Burr is persistent in his opinion that Paine wrote the document, and Mr. Underwood is proud to proclaim that "Jefferson's honor remains untarnished," etc. Now all this, in the shape which the dispute has taken, seems to me little less ridiculous than the classic "tempest in a teapot," and hardly worth serious notice. But there is a serious side to the question. Had Mr. Burr indignantly denied that Paine wrote the Declaration, and Mr. Underwood undertaken to shield Jefferson from the soft impeachment of even the latter's own "admission" that he wrote it, I conceive that both gentlemen would hav been engaged in a worthy enterprise, instead of the bootless folly with which they hav so long permitted themselvs to be excited—almost "coming to blows." What matters it who wrote the document, Paine or Jefferson, if either?

It is about time, I think, that somebody should "rise up" and defend both Paine and Jefferson against the charge of having composed that peculiar state paper; and since nobody else seems inclined to move in the matter, I humbly beg leave to "champion the honor and credit" of the former, and solemnly protest against Mr. Burr's attempt to sully the fame of Paine; and I dare say that somebody will be found to oppose Mr. Underwood's advocacy of Jefferson.

Probably no more wretched state paper than is the Declaration, in its rhetorical character, or rather, irrhetorical blemishes, and its absurd attempts at political philosophizing, was ever deliberately penned. In the fact that it has become a great historical monument on the high-road of the progress of nations, and therefore notable, I find no sufficient excuse for Mr. Burr's attempt to fasten its authorship upon the illustrious Paine; and were I not aware that Mr. Burr is an honorable gentleman, eager in the pursuit of truth, and ever ready to defend it, I should suspect that he harbors, after all, some unaccountable ill-feeling toward Paine, and should therefore be less willing than now to think that Mr. Burr's strange conduct in the premises may be explained upon the hypothesis that his zeal in the cause of Paine has gotten the better of his usual judgment. Had Mr. Burr alleged that Paine outlined the Magna Charta and inspired the barons to demand for it the sign manual of King John, or that he wrote the "Essay on Man," or the best portions of the Justinian code, and proceeded to prove his allegation by the doctrin of the transmigration of souls and Paine's well-known political and humanitary sentiments when the last time on earth, "in form incarnate," I might not hav been surprised. He might hav made out his case, perhaps. At all events, so ingenious a man as he, having such materials to work with, could not fail to make a tractatus which no man could successfully refute—till after "the day of judgment," at least.

Let us examin the document in question, and consider what dishonor Mr. Burr seeks (in apparent unconsciousness, I admit) to cast upon Paine. I intend to confine myself, for the present, to the examination of only a portion of the document as to its philological and politico-philosophizing character, etc. So far as its statement of grievances, or "facts submitted to a candid world," is and are concerned, these are alleged and arranged in a sufficiently clear, lawyer-like style. No person less than a common young lawyer of good sense and a fair degree of logical ability could hav made these allegations or charges so clear and forcible. This portion of the Declaration I attribute to the hand of John Adams, and here I dismiss it.

Let it be observed here that as to the general spirit of the sentiments of the Declaration, and the points of really vital interest which it comprises, no one man, or hundred men, could claim special credit therefor. Every scholar conversant with the history of the colonies for a score of years before 1776 knows that the questions involved in the Declaration had been before that year discussed in public throughout the colonies. But, to not rely upon my own study of the times preceding the Revolution, let me cite Daniel Webster. In his famous speech in reply to Hayne (U. S. Senate, 1830) Mr. Webster makes a point against the great South Carolinian in the following language: "If we should reason in that way, what would become of the distinguished honor of the author of the Declaration of Independence? There is not a sentiment in that paper which had not been voted and resolved in the assemblies and other popular bodies in the country over and over again." We hav, then, only to do with the style of the document, its composition, in short; and that is all that Mr. Burr could safely claim for Paine, at most.

Here I beg leave, with your permission, Mr. Editor, to cite that portion of the Declaration upon which I most wish to comment now, in order that your readers may hav immediately before them what Mr. Burr so ungraciously, as I claim, imputes to Paine. Assailed "oft and again" from the "coward's castle" by dastard defamers, even his voiceless, harmless tombstone dishonored and broken by his pious foes, and all that, it has been reserved for Paine, poor man, to be assaulted by one of his most devoted disciples with the charge of having been guilty of enacting the following outrage upon the king's English and upon good sense and the integrity of history. Here is the thing:

"When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which hav connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter and abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," etc.

I quote above only about half of what precedes the statement of "facts." But this will suffice for the present, for I foresee that an exhaustiv criticism of the Declaration would fill many pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, so much food does it furnish for comment, for satire, irony, and comical annotation. Indeed, the subject grows under contemplation, and I fancy that a good-sized volume might be filled regarding the crudities and sophisms of the Declaration for the literary edification and moral instruction of the rising generation. I say the "rising generation," for most of the present generation are, and all of the last were, persuaded that that document is a sort of divinely-inspired work. It is and was accepted—its poor rhetoric, absurdities, and all—as religious sectaries and bigots accept "holy writ," without question. For, years ago, it was the custom to celebrate the Fourth of July in every town and hamlet, and a conspicuous feature of the celebration was the "reading of the Declaration," which was ascribed to the most ambitious young man of the town, the local lawyer, or the parish pastor, and he read it in such sonorous style that all hearers got lost in mazes of admiration for the document. Such are prejudiced, therefore, and I would no more attempt to convert them from their foolish reverence for the paper than essay to beat sense into the head of a hard-shell Baptist with anything less than an ordinary sledge-hammer.

So full of errors is the first paragraph of the document over which friend Burr is expending the best portion of his life in order to impose its authorship upon the great Paine that I hardly know how to address myself to the work of analyzing it without seeming to be hypercritical. But let us begin with the first clause of it, "When in the course of human events." Did Paine write that? I answer, No, for he well knew that "events" cannot properly be spoken of as having, or coming in, a "course." Affairs may, perhaps, observe a course; but events are individuate finalities, each the terminus (and only the terminus) of something or some "course" of things, as absolutely so as the tips of a cow's horns or the points of a harrow's "teeth;" and one might as well attempt to predicate a current or a "course" of these as of "events." But suppose the word "events" were correct in this connection, what of the adjectiv "human?" Are there any human events? Human affairs there may be, but who will define a "human event?"

But to proceed—"It becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the bands which hav connected them with another." "Dissolve the bands which hav connected!"

Could Paine hav been guilty of so incorrect a figure of speech? Can bands (cords, ropes, things which connect) properly be spoken of as dissolvable? We break, rupture, untie, disconnect, bands; but it was the province of one man only—the author of the Declaration—to find out a process of dissolving them rhetorically, and he didn't vouchsafe to tell us how. So much for that clause, now; we will soon return to it for other absurdities. "And to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them." Precisely what is intended to be understood by this clause perhaps Mr. Burr can tell us. I am sure nobody else can. Whether we are to understand the "laws of nature" and those of "nature's God" as distinctiv or not, I am not able to decide. But if distinctiv, will somebody tell us in what respects? The clause is confused, and so I "hold" that Paine could not hav written it. But if those laws are one and the same, then the Declaration maker was guilty of an inexcusable pleonasm. The "laws of nature" are made no stronger by calling them also the laws of "nature's God," while the clause itself is weakened, as every rhetorician knows. But what of going about "to assume a station to which the laws," etc., "entitle them?" Was it not the intent of the author to speak of a station to the occupancy of which the people are entitled? If yes, why didn't he say so? This mere philological criticism may be charged as hypercritical, or strained, but nevertheless it is strictly correct, and we must remember that we are examining a "classical document," a "great state paper," now.

"A decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation?" What "separation?" We find no separation "aforesaid." There has been some talk (all "talk!") above about what people ought to do when it is necessary to separate, etc.; but no separation has been spoken of; so the words "the separation," are, in the rhetorical sense, improperly used, and the clause, therefore, bungling, and unlike, I assert, what Mr. Paine would hav written. Let Mr. Burr search Paine's works and find for us therein a sentence of his so long as this first paragraph containing a tithe of its rhetorical blunders—to say nothing of its other absurdities. But to leave mere philological criticism for the moment; here we hav the adjectiv "decent" before "respect." Now did anybody except the tyro who collated those words even hear of an *in*decent respect for anything? He obviously had heard of such a thing! To review a little. Pray tell me how "when it becomes necessary" for a people to "assume a station" to the occupancy of which they are entitled by "God's" laws, when, in other words, they are compelled absolutely (necessary-ly) to assume it, how comes it that even an indecent respect, not to say "decent respect" for other people's "opinions," should impel them to go into an apology about it to other people? Ah! I fear that the good man who wrote that part of the Declaration hadn't much respect, "decent" or indecent, for the laws of nature's God!

To my mind it is clear enough that he who penned the first paragraph of the Declaration did not know what he ought to say, or how to better it, if he had known. He must hav a first sentence, and he essayed it. He struggled, waded in the depths of perplexity, trying to reach sŏlid ground sometime, but failed, like many another man before and since. The first sentence of the writer or the orator often costs more than all that succeeds it. Every considerable writer or public speaker knows that.

But it is not in the first paragraph that we find all the "riches." The next is a mine of them. I hav quoted less than half of the second paragraph, and do not intend to undergo in this writing the labor of exposing the virtues of the remaining portion. "We hold these truths to be self-evident." You do? Well, if they are "self-evident" what's the object of proclaiming them? Might you not hav as properly declared in a solemn state paper the self-evident truth that the sun shines? Did you write that, Mr. Paine? Of course, I know your reply is, No! But where is the rhetorical propriety of declaring that you "hold" self-evident truths? The self-evident is demonstrated already. It is proper to declare that one "holds" this or that opinion, or holds, in the sense of will maintain, a proposition. But a man "holding" ("on to") a bundle of self-evident truths, evident to all the world, would present an example of hyperbolical dignity too comical to be laughed at! We could only pity him.

But what are these self-evident truths? Why, don't you know? They are these: First, "that all men are created equal." Ah! how or wherefore "equal?" Certainly not morally, intellectually, physically, or socially equal. How, then? Historically? politically? possibly? It may be, but point me to the page of history or philosophy which proves the equality. But I forget; these truths are "self-evident." The Declaration says so; but there never lived the man who understands what the Declaration says; and I contend that he does not liv who exactly understands what the author of the Declaration meant to say, and it is my solemn opinion that he had no definit idea of what he was trying to say; for, see, he proceeds to throw "light" upon his intent and declares thus, "That they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights," and "that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness!" "Unalienable," that is (says Webster), "incapable of being put off," which, being so, I insist that nobody has committed suicide or lost his liberty in these United States (the only country where these "unalienable" things are discovered) since the Fourth of July 1776! We hav all been cheated by the newspapers, which pretend from time to time to record suicides and hangings. Verily, this is a world of illusions!

Now we come to where discussion would giv us enough to do for a year in analyzing or weighing the statement that there are such "rights" as "life, liberty," etc. Mark, the author does not say rights to life and liberty, etc. He makes the latter synonyms of "rights." I hav no purpose, at present, of considering in their length and breadth all the profound questions which arise out of this clause about the "rights" with which all men are endowed, we are told. Here is meat for the most subtle and careful study, the result of which study is, inevitably, that we come to comprehend what an amount of false philosophy is crowded into those few words, all "rot," and nothing less. Paine could never hav been so absurd as to write that clause. He was too good a philosopher for that.

But the above-cited clause is followed by another, the absurdity of which the ablest pen could but partially expose. It needs for its illumination the sarcastic grimace of an Aristophanes and the indiscribable guffaw of a Guinea negro! What is it? "That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men" (not cats) "deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Now here we hav it. Governments are instituted, and for what? "To secure these rights." What rights? Why! you booby, don't you know? Our inalienable rights, of course. An inalienable right being about as fixed as the central atom of the globe, or as secure as the mountains on their bases, the query rises what governments are "up to" when undertaking to reduce the superlativly secure to the positivly secure. One would be led to suspect such effort to be a little supererogatory, I fancy. But what object would there be in instituting governments at all if all men are endowed by a creator, too, with inalienable life and liberty, and also with the "pursuit of happiness?" "Pursuit!" a queer thing to be endowed with! Something like being endowed with the invisible and intangible line which a hound cuts through the air when chasing a fox!

Again, what a sublime sight when "the governed" go about instituting a government in order to "secure" things "inalienable," which they couldn't get rid of, of course, should they try, and which the government could not giv them, because they, and not the government, already possess them! If anybody can make clear this jargon of the Declaration, let him. "I pause for a reply," and I don't hear the voice of Paine, Mr. Burr, making the attempt.

Further, and I will soon hav done. The next sentence tells us that "whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends" (we havn't heard of any "ends" before; certainly these are not the "rights" in question, for they are beginnings. We came into the world "endowed" with them. What then means "these ends?") "it is the right of the people to abolish it" (abolish the form, and leave the government standing, that is!) "and to institute new government" (What! when the old government still stands? Aye?) "laying its foundations on such principles" (ordinarily the "foundations" of a structure are supposed to be at the bottom; but in the Declaration "foundations" and common sense and all things else seem to be reversed), "and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." What would, think you, reader, seem "most likely to effect their happiness" when "they" are already in possession of the "unalienable" rights, life, liberty, and that other funny right, the pursuit of happiness?

Now this is only one-half of the "exordium," before we come to the "facts." The other half is distinguished by blunders and absurdities; and the concluding portion of the Declaration contains much verbiage, bombast, and bad rhetoric. But I hav no time to go into examination of these now, and you, Mr. Editor, hav not sufficient space to allow me. If I hav said enough to make out a prima facie case in support of my proposition that Paine did not write the Declaration, in the opinion of those who hav respect enough for his memory to believe that he was too tender-hearted, if not too learned, to be a "wanton butcher" of words and thoughts even, I am satisfied. As for our friend Burr, we will calmly and gladly read his next article in support of his claim that Paine is the author of the Declaration, after he shall hav made clear what the sophomoric tirade of words which we hav examined means.

It will not do to attempt to explain it by reconstruction. The paper must be considered literally, as it is constructed. It is a solemn document (very solemn!) No "exegesis" like that by which the Bible is exploited will serve. It cannot be permitted that the Declaration be made "an old fiddle" of and forced to play all sorts of tunes. There it is, in common words. There is obviously no mystery about it, and yet, strange to say, it will require a miracle to explain it without reconstructing it, and several miracles to defend its poor rhetoric. Let nobody call upon the spirit of Paine to illuminate it! "He rests in peace," we hope, and it would be the "most unkindest cut of all" to avow him to be the Declaration's author at his face.

Fifty-six of our "good old fathers" signed the document. None of them, save about four, was liberally educated, and none was much skilled in composition. They doubtless thought it "expressed their ideas" (and perhaps it did); and as they wished to declare something at any rate, and hadn't time or ability to put their thoughts into better shape (or to get better thoughts!) signed the document as, I suppose, a man awaiting sentence of death would sign his "last will and testament," without standing on ceremonies; and it served a purpose, and so is well. But when, a hundred years after, in days of refined and critical scholarship, a man comes before the world claiming the composition of the Declaration of Independence as an honor to the memory of an able old writer, and a dead hero who can't defend himself, things are certainly getting "at cross purposes!"

A few words now about the Declaration as a whole. The success of our revolutionary fathers in the field and in the councils, which resulted in the Constitution, cast a sort of veil over their vagaries and brazen pretenses, and the Declaration came to be looked upon as a wonderful affair. Had they been defeated and humbled that instrument would hav been weighed at its true value, as a vapid, high-sounding political manifesto, merely intended to fire the colonial heart—that is, the spirits of the groundlings. It doubtless fulfilled the purposes for which it was heralded. But no man of sense need be told that the signers of the document did not believe a word of its "glittering generalities." They proclaimed the equality of all men, and blustered about human rights, while most of them personally held slaves, and twelve, I believe, of the thirteen colonies maintained chattel slavery; and the pulpits of the time, like those of later date, sustained the institution as a holy, Bible-founded system. But the cunning and able of that day, the Adamses, Hancock, Jefferson, Franklin, Morris, etc., who, as such men from the remotest historic period down ever hav done, thirsted for distinction and personal power, and were not overscrupulous about what means they used to win them. So they magnified the mole-hills of their political "grievances" into mountains of wrong, and charged their existence to the king of Great Britain, in that stately part of the document which details "the facts to a candid world." There never was such a parade made before or since over almost nothing. The common herd of our present millions undergo all the while, and without knowing it, severer political cheatings and other wrongs than our fathers ever suffered, and the chief merit of our political institutions over those of other countries (if they hav any) is that they are calculated to wheedle the great masses into subservience or slavery to rulers a little more easily than those of other nations. Our wages-slaves of to-day, counted by the millions, are exploited worse than were their predecessors of the Revolution, and made tools of by political jugglers, and yet they swing their hats on the Fourth of July and fancy that they liv in a "free country."

The clear-headed old sharpers and politicians of 1776 knew well that to the ignorant yeoman and vicious lower classes,

> "Doubtless the pleasure is as great
> Of being cheated as to cheat,"

and they therefore flattered these with high-sounding words and fed them upon exciting vagaries; and some of the old tricksters went so far, we read, as to pray over their own jugglery! But I need not enlarge upon this point. Everybody who stops to study and search for the causes of whatever successes we as a people hav enjoyed, or now enjoy, over other nations, if any, finds that they are due mainly to our extensiv territory and its varied resources and our comparativly sparse population. The Declaration brought to the chattel-slave and wages-slave no increased liberty, and "democracy" itself is but an empty name to cheat by, while "republicanism" is simply a trick of government too shallow to deceive any except the fools. In almost no state of the Union hav we a particle better laws governing the ownership and tenancy of land than hav the people of Ireland to-day. In some state, or possibly states, homesteads are exempt from alienation by civil process, which is a good thing for some families, but generally speaking there is nothing in our laws to shield us from the fate of the downtrodden of Ireland, and this after a hundred years' existence of that venerable Declaration!

A HATER OF SHAMS.

Change of Time.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since sending you the notice of the next annual Freethinkers' Convention I hav learned from Mr. A. S. Cobb, of Dunkirk, President of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association, that the annual camp-meeting of that association is appointed to be held from the 5th to the 28th days of August inclusiv, and as there are many speakers and other persons who would like to attend both gatherings, it has been thought best to change the time of holding the Freethinkers' Convention to August 31st and the four following days.

And allow me to giv notice that the annual meeting of the Friends of Progress will be held at Waterloo, N. Y., on the 4th and 5th days of June next. This is the thirty-first annual meeting, I think. These meetings are always very numerously attended by the Liberals of western and central New York, often by ten or fifteen hundred people on Sunday, and I hav never known one to fail of being interesting.

Among the speakers announced for this meeting I notice the names of the eloquent female lecturer, Mrs. Amelia Colby, of St. Louis, and her friend Mrs. Smith, who I learn will furnish the singing and instrumental music.

Your correspondent anticipates meeting many of his Freethought friends at the Waterloo meeting. My post-office address for the next three months will be 51 Fort avenue, Roxbury, Boston, Mass. Persons ordering those magnificent "posters" will remember the address.

H. L. GREEN.

On the Skirmish Line.

Since my last announcement the following live Liberals hav enrolled themselvs in the Iowa Liberal League army.

Annual members: A. L. Potter, Mrs. A. L. Potter, and Miss Vie Dalton, La Motte; L. B. Dawson, Cedar Rapids. Life members: Leroy Dutton, Grand Mound; L. B. Potter, Bellevue. Who next?

I started out this morning upon my spring and summer trip. I hope to sow the good seed of Freethought more extensivly than ever this year. I am carrying a large line of Liberal books and pamphlets, photographs, etc., and am taking orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers.

I want to organize a League in every town, city, and county where the secularists can muster ten or more true men and women, throughly devoted to the cause of universal mental liberty. I am prepared to explain and defend the principles and purposes of the League, and speak upon other progressiv and reformatory subjects.

At Cedar Rapids there is noticeable a marked Liberalizing of the thoughts of men upon religious topics. Much of the credit for this salutary change is due to a few earnest workers in the Liberal vinyard, and then the scientific lectures of Prof. Wm. Denton, of which he delivered three here recently, hav resulted in publishing to the world much of religious heresy which was latent, suppressed from so-called "prudential motivs." Mr. Denton is an earnest, pleasant speaker, and his course of lectures here was a complete success. He had full houses and attentiv, appreciativ auditors.

Dr. A. B. Dennis worked hard for the success of this attempt to awaken the sluggish thought of this city, and I am very much gratified to learn that he is not financially a loser. "Wealth and respectability" are always conservativ, loth to do anything for the elevation of humanity, hence it is no matter for surprise that, as a rule, the hard-working mechanic and struggling professional man has here, as elsewhere, to bear the burden and heat of the day.

The car shops of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids, and Northern Railway are located here, and among the workmen there Freethought has taken a strong hold and its roots are spreading deeper and wider under the skilful culture of Mr. T. J. Burke.

One such live Liberal is worth more to the race than a stateful of Grundy henchmen and "man-afraid-of-his-business" Liberals. Among the other outspoken, activ Freethinkers here I must not forget to mention C. P. and M. M. Reed, S. Hellan, C. F. Maurer, J. Polak, and Messrs. Wolf, Eliot, Kilburn, Dawson, and Stuart. Some of these lack faith in organization, but a wider and more fundamental experience will show them that without organization it is impossible to reap the substantial fruits of agitation.

Rev. Rogan, of the Universalist church, is stirring his congregation up mightily, and, after his last discourse, in which he had torn to pieces the claimed divinity of Jesus, he told them that if they could not stand the expression of his honest opinions they had but to say so and he would step down and out. It is but a few years since he left an orthodox church. Should he now leave the Universalist it is hard to tell what will become of some quasi-Liberals who during the past few years hav attended and helped support that church because it was more popular to do so than to be seen at the derided Spiritualist and Liberal meetings.

Let us hav Liberal celebrations of the Fourth of July. Why not? Who wants to listen to a long-winded chaplain upon the natal glories of the secular republic?

"How it looks to be an Atheist," is the announced subject of a sermon to be preached at the Methodist tabernacle. This is a poser. A number of comical answers suggest themselvs to my mind, but lest the question was asked in all seriousness I forbear to giv them utterance. It is a pity to poke fun at people who do not know that science is abroad and that she has found no God in all the limitless expanse of the universe. Address me at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, box 881.

Spiritualist Convention.

The next convention of the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining counties will be held in the village of Hartford, Mich., commencing on Saturday, May 28th, 1881, at three o'clock P. M., and continuing over Sunday, May 29th. Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn and Mrs. M. C. Gale are engaged as speakers. A limited amount of free entertainment will be furnished, and hotel rates will be one dollar per day. Let there be a good attendance and a grand old time.

The Shepherds Aroused.

In no way is the effectivness of Col. Ingersoll's late lectures more shown than by the fluttering which has taken place among the clergy. The way they went for him on Sunday before last was a shame to lovers of truth. The Rev. Dr. Newman, who went around the world at the government's expense, announced in the Sunday papers that the theme of his morning discourse would be, "Brazen Infidelity," in which he classed the immortal Bob as the "Brazen Infidel." It seemed to disturb his holy soul that three thousand people should rush to the Academy of Music on Sunday night previous and giv one dollar each to hear the arch-Infidel ridicule the Jewish Bible and its revengeful, changeable God. The parson took revenge by denouncing the Infidels whom Ingersoll had applauded, to wit, Julian, Voltaire, Diderot, Spinoza, Hume, and Paine, trying to make it appear that they were nearly as bad as some Christians.

The Rev. J. B. Riemensnyder, D. D., gave out his subject, "A Rebuke to Infidel Scoffing," and the zeal he displayed in lashing Ingersoll and others was amusing, to say the least. He said many things totally untrue, and among others that Voltaire, Hume, and Paine recanted on their death-beds. If a clergyman cannot lie he cannot do anything; but their raving has become almost harmless. The Rev. Dr. Fulton, the misanthrope, and the Rev. Dr. Talmage, as well as several others of too small caliber to mention, also had to show out their imbecil spite by denouncing Ingersoll. They find epithets handier and more in their line than arguments. If instead of lies and abuse they would show the falsity of Ingersoll's statements and arguments they would prove themselvs more manly than now; but that is too much to expect of them.

Some pious papers are following in the same line, as well as some not so very pious. The Glen Cove Gazette givs a column of the bitterest abuse of Ingersoll and other Infidels. It, however, does little more than show the pointless enmity of its orthodox soul. One clergyman said to a friend of ours, whom he took to be a sympathizer with the old dogmas: "Such men as Ingersoll should not be allowed to be heard. The laws ought to be changed so as to prevent such scoffing and blasphemy." Poor dupes, let them rave on. The best days of these barking dogs are over. A few more decades and their whole system may be thrown to the rubbish heap of antique and absurd myths and falsehoods.

Comstock's Defeat.

Many of our readers will not regret to learn that Comstock's prolonged effort at Albany to procure legislation to suit himself and to clothe himself with more power than he has hitherto wielded has met with a serious rebuff. The House Committee to which his bill was referred hav reported against it, and there is now no probability of its becoming a law. After hanging around the Legislature a good share of the winter, making most energetic exertions to insure senators and assemblymen to look favorably upon his bill, Comstock will now be allowed to remain at home to attend to his various arrests and prosecutions. His bill will not become a law this year, and very likely never.

It is cheering that our legislators are able to see the impropriety of placing such laws on the statute books of our state as this man demanded, and which he loudly boasted he would soon succeed in placing there. Doubtless, various influences tended to this result, but probably nothing had a greater effect in this direction than T. B. Wakeman's able and argumentativ speech made before the House Committee to which Comstock's bill was referred, a copy of which was sent to every member of the legislature. Let every right-minded person rejoice at the result attained.

Paine's Monument.

Since our last report the following donations hav been received for repairing Paine's monument at New Rochelle:

L. DeWitt Griswold,	$ .25	W. G. Seacor,	$4.00
Alex. Risk,	1.00	Earnest Rhein,	1.00
H. B. Wiser,	.50	D. A. Kahle,	.50

We can now state that the repairs to the monument, the relaying in cement of the wall surrounding the lot, the repairing of the iron fence, and the filling and sodding of the lot are completed and paid for. The whole has cost not quite $150. The monument is said to look better than when new.

On Monday, the 30th inst. (Decoration day), a meeting will be held at the monument. Several speakers will be on hand and address those present upon the rededication of the monument, after which a collation will be served up. This meeting will take place upon the arrival there of the train leaving the city at 10 A. M. An invitation is extended to all to accompany us out. The distance from the city is some eighteen miles, and if the weather is favorable the trip will be a pleasant one in more ways than one. We hope to see a goodly crowd present on the occasion of the rededication.

Boston Indignant.

Although it rained hard on Sunday at the "Hub" there was a fair audience at Investigator Hall to express indignation at the course pursued by the postal department against Mrs. Dr. Chase's Physiologist, Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, and Mr. Stillman's Agent's Advocate.

Horace Seaver presided and made a brief opening address, introducing Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who, coming to the front of the platform, insisted upon having the speech of the old war-horse of Liberalism, Hon. Elizur Wright, first. Mr. Wright thereupon stepped to the front and gave one of his clear, logical efforts, which elicited much applause. He showed that while the postal department lent itself to Anthony Comstock to suppress the Physiologist for advertising the Comstock syringe, it also opened its own advertising columns in its "Postal Guide" for January, 1881, to the advertisment of a syringe which was claimed to to be superior for all purposes!

Mr. Bell followed Mr. Wright with letters from Mr. T. C. Leland, Dr. Sarah B. Chase, D. M. Bennett, and others.

Mr. Wakeman came next with the remark that he liked to visit Boston when its citizens were indignant. Barbarism represented the priesthood and civilization the cause of Liberalism. There was a constant tendency of the priests to encroach on the temporal power. But the former had received a signal rebuke through the efforts of Liberals at Albany. The attack on the Physiologist is a new move, and a regular eye-opener. Here an order comes like lightning. In Russia they warn first. The Liberals must enter the political arena and show what can be done with the ballot. It rests largely with the Liberals to say what shall be done in this country, if they will but unite and work, under the motto of liberty and purity, now and forever, one and inseperable.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., followed Mr. Wakeman, showing good reasons why his Health Monthly should hav the privileges of the bulk-rates. Regularly issued for over five years; bona-fide circulation of 5,000; largely quoted by the press; open to all advertisers who will pay the regular rates, etc.

Mr. Stillman showed that his Agent's Advocate was as much entitled to the privileges of the mails as other papers of its class. He noticed Anthony's book in his paper and criticised its syntax. In another article he said that Comstock was not to be believed. The very next number was rejected by the postal department, although it had been published and admitted to second-class postage for three years. With one stroke of the pen his business had been destroyed.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer followed, supporting the views which had been presented so ably by Mr. Wakeman.

Mr. Mendum and M. L. Babcock made brief but pointed speeches, which were highly appreciated by the audience.

Mr. H. L. Green was called upon and proceeded to explain why he had stepped out of the League. But he believed in Mr. Wakeman's ability and honesty. In the course of his speech he extended the hand of friendship to Mr. Wakeman, and the audience cheered while the two gentlemen participated in a hearty, good-natured shake. Mr. Green hoped that all differences would be buried, and that the Liberals would unite to defend free speech, free press, and free mails.

The meeting was closed with a brief speech by Mr. Verity, who urged the Liberals to come forward and support those who were stricken down by the government at Comstock's behest.

The largest and most enthusiastic meeting took place in the afternoon in Paine Hall. The weather had cleared somewhat and the hall was well filled with those who had assembled to listen to the eloquent address of Mr. Chainey on "The Lessons of the Hour." In his discourse he strongly denounced the wrong which had been inflicted upon the physiological papers, showing that the people and even the children must be taught all that there is to be learned respecting their bodies.

When Mr. Chainey concluded he called on Mr. Wakeman, and the audience by its calls and cheers made it impossible for Wakeman to retreat. This able champion was equal to the surprise and the emergency, and spoke for thirty or forty minutes, as our pious friends would say, under inspiration.

Taking the great speeches of the morning and afternoon together and averaging the audiences of the forenoon and afternoon, the Boston indignation meeting may be voted a success, in spite of the rain.

Indignation Meeting.

At a public meeting, held in Buffalo by the Liberal League on Friday evening, May 12th, to express a second and earnest protest against the late outrage on the freedom of the United States mails, in the absence of the regular officers, the following were elected: President, S. B. Bancroft; Secretary, Dr. Edwards; Business Committee, Mrs. A. H. Colby, Olive K. Smith, Parker Pillsbury (delegate from Rochester Liberal League), George Whitcomb.

The committee on resolutions reported the following, which, after a lengthy and able consideration, were at a late hour adopted without dissent:

Resolved, That this meeting has heard with surprise, indignation, and alarm that another flagrant outrage has been perpetrated on the freedom of the United States mails in excluding from them the able, useful, and in every way worthy public journals known as the Physiologist, published by Dr. Sara B. Chase, New York; Health Monthly, by Dr. E. B. Foote, New York; Health Journal, by Dr. Kinget, New York, also the Agent's Advocate, under the most grossly false and absurd pretense that they contain matter indelicate, obscene, and unfit for public perusal.

Resolved, That we believe most of the many and frightful evils now surrounding the problem of human generation, as well in marriage as out of it, the many and constantly increasing instances of abortion, infanticide, and child murder, involving not unfrequently the death of mother as well as of offspring, are the result of profound ignorance regarding the laws of life, that very ignorance which is pre-eminently the object of the proscribed journals, especially the Physiologist and its gifted editor, Mrs. Dr. Chase, to enlighten and remove.

Resolved, That we cannot too strongly express our abhorrence and detestation of the traffic in and circulation of truly "obscene and lascivious literature" in whatever form and by whatever means, private or public.

Resolved, That we must regard with no less abhorrence much of the official action of the "New York Society for the Suppression of Vice" and its inhuman and unclean agent, Anthony Comstock, especially in their unconstitutional as well as unrighteous attack upon the freedom of the mails and the press, and cruel fining and imprisonment of innocent men whom the government authorities themselvs declared hav been guilty of no crime nor offense against the law.

Resolved, That we do hereby most solemnly protest against the increase of any of the powers of such society and its agents, by any legislativ act whatever, whether by federal or state government. And our profoundest thanks are due to T. B. Wakeman, of New York city, for his prompt, noble, and generous appearance before a committee of the Assembly, to whom had been referred a "bill to largely increase the jurisdiction and powers of that society;" and for his able and unanswerable arguments against any such dangerous and unwarrantable action.

Resolved, That these resolutions be signed by the President and Secretary of this meeting, and respectfully presented to our city editors, and forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER and daily Truth, of New York city; the Investigator and Banner of Light, of Boston; Mind and Matter, of Philadelphia; and Western Light, of St. Louis, for publication in their columns.

More Postal Censorship.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS AND LIBERALS OF AMERICA,

Dear Friends: I am led to make an appeal to you for your assistance by the recent decision of the post-office department at Washington, D. C., which excludes my new quarterly paper from being admitted to the mails at pound rates, upon the ground that it is an advertising sheet. I hav done all in my power to hav the decision reversed, but every appeal I hav made has proved fruitless. I am satisfied that religious bigotry is the cause of the rejection of the paper, as it is no more of an advertising sheet than any other Spiritual or Liberal paper that is sent through the mails. Thinking that there could not be a possibility of my paper being rejected, I ordered and paid for 25,000 copies of the first number, and supposed that the mailing of the edition would cost me not over $50.00, but by the decision rendered I shall be obliged to pay $250.00, or one cent on each paper. I cannot meet this amount, as I hav already mailed 7,000 at that rate, which has taken all my available funds. I regret exceedingly to be obliged to ask assistance, but assistance I must hav, and at once. All amounts sent to me, however small, will be acknowledged in No. 2 of the Advance and Review, and credited as subscriptions to that paper. Shall I make this appeal in vain?

Fraternally yours, JAMES A. BLISS.

Ho, for the "New" New Testament!

Everybody and his wife will wish to see the long-talked-of revised New Testament. Even Liberals, who do not believe any more in the inspired Testaments, New or Old, than they hav proofs of, will be anxious to see what changes hav been made in the Christians' word of God. We propose to accommodate this disposition according to our ability.

The revised New Testament is now being printed in great numbers, and in a very few days will be ready to throw upon a feverish market. We hav made such arrangements as will enable us to sell the new old book at the lowest prices, as follows:

Separate gospels, 3 cents; the four gospels, 10 cents; the New Testament, new version, paper, 15 cents; cloth, 40 cents; Russia, gilt top, 75 cents; Turkey, full gilt, $1.40. The New Testament, old and new version, with pages contrasted, 75 cents; Russia, gilt top, $1.25; Turkey, full gilt, $1.75.

Orders addressed to this office will be filled promptly.

MR. T. B. WAKEMAN'S able argument before the Legislative Committee on Charitable and Religious Societies has been issued in pamphlet form and is now ready for sending out. Let those who wish copies send in their orders. Price, 25 cents.

Round the World Fund.

The following persons hav pledged five dollars each (one share) to help take THE TRUTH SEEKER editor round the world. Those preceded by an asterisk (*) hav already paid. Those not paid will oblige by remitting promptly. Two or three volumes of the book descriptiv of the journey will be issued to each contributor as soon as ready.

A Hall for Liberals.

It is gratifying to see that public attention is being directed to the matter of having a hall in this city for the use of Liberals for meetings, societies, and other purposes. We are glad to see friend Courtlandt Palmer is interested in this direction. The following sketch of an interview between him and a reporter is from the daily Herald:

The notable success of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll in filling on two successiv Sunday evenings two of the most spacious audience rooms in this city has turned the attention of some gentlemen of Liberal views to the subject of acquiring or building an edifice in which discourses of an analogous character may be regularly delivered, both on Sundays and week days. There is at present no such edifice or hall in New York, except the small and inconveniently located Science Hall, in Eighth street—the headquarters of the Liberal Club—which will accommodate but five hundred or six hundred persons, and which is utterly unknown to nineteen-twentieths of the well-to-do citizens who applauded Col. Ingersoll in Booth's Theater and the Academy of Music. The Liberals think that they ought to hav a temple of their own, which may afford all the conveniences of a well-appointed church and which may be known as the permanent headquarters of Freethought. One of their number, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, of No. 151 East Eighteenth street, has taken the subject in hand, with a view to securing co-operation in the enterprise. Mr. Palmer is a gentleman of considerable property in real estate, and was formerly president of the Society of the Religion of Humanity. It is not, however, in the interests of that body that he wishes the erection of a temple of Freethought, but in the interest of all shades of opinion which recognize science as their creed and the advancement of humanity as the highest religious object. In an interview Mr. Palmer expressed to a Herald representativ his views upon this topic at length. He thinks that a building of the kind contemplated could by proper management be made to pay dividends. Merely as a business speculation, therefore, it might be accomplished by any enterprising capitalist. Mr. Palmer, however, perfers that it should not be a private investment, but one in which all Liberals, according to their means, may take stock, with the same satisfaction that church-members find in securing convenient quarters for their respectiv organizations. Mr. Palmer would even prefer that the stock should be taken up chiefly in small subscriptions, say of $25, so that the proprietary interest may be diffused as widely as possible. Of course there must be a few subscriptions running up into the thousands, but this does not seem difficult to Mr. Palmer. He remarked that the real difficulty consists in the fact that the Liberals hav now no cohesion and do not even know each other by name. Among the 5,000 men and women who cheered Col. Ingersoll there was doubtless wealth enough and enterprise enough to provide at once for the building of a dozen such halls, if the proper persons could be brought together to take some concerted action. Mr. Palmer proposes to take measures to bring the subject before such persons and believes the time to be at hand when a vast movement will be made for the utilization of the Sunday rest in the interests of a religion which knows no creed but science and whose object is the ethical enlightenment of humanity.

The following is from Truth:

The desire for a temple or public hall in which the views of Liberal thinkers can be expressed is doubtless a growing one in the breasts of those who wish to see humanity enlightened, and of those who wish to learn. Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, of 151 east Eighteenth street, is the first to publicly express this desire. A Truth reporter called upon him at his residence yesterday to ask his opinion upon the subject. Mr. Palmer's views are utterly opposed to wornout religious dogmas, but they are also reconstructiv. In place of such dogmas which are no longer true and capable of saving grace, he would substitute a new creed, based on science for its faith, humanity, and enthusiasm. This creed is rapidly formulating itself.

Mr. Palmer said: "I would like to see a home or temple where this kind of reconstructed thought would always find itself welcome. My particular ism may be called American Positivism, of which the ablest representativ is Mr. T. B. Wakeman. Him I should like to see installed as a teacher of the new faith, and to speak from Sunday to Sunday, as Professor Adler does."

Mr. Palmer said his views in regard to the uses and purposes of such a building were much broader than any "ism" of his own, and he desired that all thought in its relation to popular welfare should there hav a hearing. He would hav specialists in astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology hold forth on its platform.

He would like to see a regenerated Liberal club there domiciled. The old Liberal Club has for many years dragged its weary length along in its unattractiv quarters at Science Hall. But it is based on the right idea—the consideration of every subject and the discussion of it from every stand-point. For such and analagous purposes should the proposed edifice be used, and above its portal should be inscribed, "To Science and Humanity."

Mr. Palmer thinks that while it would be best to disassociate the enterprise from the question of investment, still as a temporary expedient it could be made to pay at least a moderate dividend, through rentals derived from stores and offices erected in front, and from the rental of the hall proper on off nights. The dimensions of the hall should be about those of Chickering Hall.

If there should not be sufficient sympathy developed to raise a sum adequate for the erection of such a building, at least enough means might be obtained, which, invested, would giv a income large enough to hire a theater from Sunday to Sunday. From its stage competent scientists might instruct the people as to what they should do to be saved. In default of a capitalized fund of this description perhaps a number of subscribers might be found who would pledge themselvs to a yearly contribution to support the enterprise.

The gentleman said: "I particularize a theater, because I believe the theaters of to-day are much closer allied to a true morality than the pulpit itself. The stage, although distorting facts, still does base itself on facts. The orthodox pulpit bases itself on dogmas which in the light of modern truth are, and can be, nothing else but lies.

"In conclusion," said Mr. Palmer, "it is with great diffidence that I appear before the public, and only do so from the fact that I feel a crying need of a new human religion, and with the hope that the times are right for a greater cohesion and organization among Liberal thinking people."

Abbot and Comstock.

The times have passed when "a great man's memory may outliv him half a year." Consequently it is necessary to apprise readers that Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot was once the President of the National Liberal League, was, in fact, its first President, was its author, finisher, and getter-up, and the League is working to-day under the Constitution unamended and unaltered, which he wrote.

In that Constitution he wisely provided, among other things, that one of the specific objects of the League would be, "To defend through the courts, by the combined efforts and means of the Liberals of the country, any American citizen whose equal religious or moral rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may hav held or expressed on the subject of religion or morals."

In spite of that provision in his own Constitution, written by his own hand, when Comstock arose he aided him in the prosecution of the editors. For this desertion of Liberalism, this backing down from his own platform of principles, the League members in Congress assembled promptly kicked him out that very year.

No office fraud ere met detection
With good opinion of election, and he never has felt quite able to forgiv the League since. After this rude separation from the child he could neither bully nor whip because it had outgrown him, he struggled on a few months more as editor of the Index, when its subscribers and readers fell off to such an extent, and the stockholders of the Index Association so unanimously refused to pay their annual assessments, that they literally starved and froze him out. In this emaciated and congealed condition he has been laid away, now nearly a year, on a shelf, in well-merited oblivion. But he has just suffered a momentary thaw, and in this interval of liquidation he lifts up his piping voice and the Index grants him a congenial page to renew his indorsement of Comstock, his life, motivs, methods, and work. It reminds one of that bank president who one day was assorting his customer's notes put in for discount. The careful financier came across one which he took up and scanned with unusual attention, and thus expressed himself, "Well, that, on the face of it, is a little the worst piece of paper that ever came into this bank." Then turning it over he added, "But with the indorsement it aint worth a damn!" The Liberal world will take Abbot's indorsement of Comstock as equally depreciativ of a value that was before questioned.

Much is written of the "Twin Relics of Barbarism." These worthies are the twin relics. Arcades ambo—blackguards both. The love of Ellingwood for Anthony surpasseth the love of woman, the love of girls in Greene street, or the love of David for Johnathan. In death they cannot be divided, for both hav been foreordained to the same mephitic stench. Birds of a feather, either one in hand, will corrupt two in a bush, and both hav been hatched by an extra divine Providence with especial adaptation for the exchange of good offices in fouling their own nests. Comstock up to his neck in a cesspool and adding to it, and Abbot his volunteer assistant—this is a spectacular panorama which religion has unrolled for us, and on which "Free" religion can look without shame. Is there any lower descent for this lump of clay in the hands of the Potter—yes, or even for the Potter himself? T. C. L.

LOTTIE E. GRIFFIN.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Thirteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is plain that you are either not disposed or not sufficiently unbiased to give my presentation of things justice. Still, on the whole, I think your last letter is perhaps as fair and strong a review as your side can offer. I will examine it, then, a little more in detail than I have some other letters.

The scriptures do not teach that God is the author of sin, but declare the contrary, and it is sin which is the author of the pain, wretchedness, sickness, suffering, and unhappiness which blight this present world. Do you believe there is such a thing as sin? that man is possessed of a spiritual and moral nature which the brute has not, and which raises him above the lower animals? Do you believe, rather can you deny, that there is to a greater or less degree a perverseness in every man that inclines him to always fall below his own standard of right? Do you not believe that there are thoughts and actions committed which defile the moral being of man in the same way that physical filth defiles his outward person, so that even I or you may be in the presence of some of our own species and feel that as compared with them we are degraded and unworthy of ranking beside them, even that our presence is almost profanity before them? And if this is true of us, of any one, as compared with finite human beings, what must the difference be between man and his creator, a finite sinner and infinite purity! Of course, the finite cannot injure or degrade the infinite, any more than the moonbeam can be polluted by the dung-hill on which it may fall. But there can be such an offense as sin against the infinite, an infinite but incorporeal person, and an offense which may seem more directly, as murder, to be a sin against man, is really a greater sin against the infinite who made the man. The greater, the nobler the person against whom it is committed, the greater the sin. You admit this in your actions. Let your dog come frisking with welcoming familiarity on your return after a long absence, repel him rudely, and while you may feel sorry for your harshness you do not apologize to the dog. Rebuff an intimate friend in the same manner and you realize it is a greater offense; although you have not injured him, you have, as it were, sinned against him, and you do not feel at rest until you have done all you can to remedy it. Nay, further, you recognize a practical difference in the greatness of offenses against your fellow-men; you grade them according to their differences of intellectual and moral perceptions. A man of fine culture, both of intellect and heart, would be deeply insulted by that which the vulgar ignorance of another would fail to consider derogatory, and which would be received with placid indifference or often assent. Offer some insult to the former and you would feel yourself guilty and make reparation and apology; offer it to the latter and you have no such consciousness of guilt. Again, say a man commits theft, he injures the person from whom he stole, but he does not injure the government of the country in which he dwells. Yet the latter punishes the offender for the offense as being against it, and you acknowledge the justice of the action. Can you not extend the principle further along the same line, and to what is an infinitely truer thing, it is a sin against the divine government, a rebellion against the infinite source of all government and all right? These are, I grant you, very homely illustrations, yet they are such as we all appreciate and of which we live in the daily practical recognition. But in strict reality there is no such thing as sin, except it be an offense against the divine being. He is the sole source of right; all that is contrary to him is wrong; all disobedience to his commands, all indifference to him, all disbelief of his existence in thought or word or deed is sin against him. He is the foundation of government. What makes right, what makes wrong? Are there any standards? Is adultery wrong? Is murder wrong? Is theft wrong? Is lying wrong? Is oppression wrong? Who says so? Man, society, the majority? But what right have they to decide? If there is no such thing as sin against the infinite person, for we see infinite mind and infinite power behind and beyond the material universe, which is also apart from it, then the blackest teachings of nihilism are eternal truths, there is no sin, there is no right or wrong; individual man's sole standard is (and he is foolish if he does not use the privilege) his own untrammeled will, his own pleasure. There is no such thing as right or wrong apart from the existence and nature of an infinite deity, who, from the fact of being the creator of the universe and all it comprehends, has the sole right to command and punish. The idea of natural right or wrong apart from him is mere folly. Tell me, is adultery or incest wrong among human beings? If you incline to the affirmative, prove it to me. I defy you to prove it, if you overlook the fact that the infinite God has interdicted it, and that for this sole reason it is wrong and a sin against him. It is not wrong among the lower animals; it is not wrong for the lower animals to steal. It is really not wrong for the lower animals to slay each other. If these things among men are not sins against God and wrong primarily because forbidden by him, then argue as you will, horrible as the state of human kind would be, they are not wrong, but merely not expedient, for men to do likewise.

Again, is fornication wrong? Eliminate the ban of the Almighty against it, and it is right and natural, and marriage is a farce. Clean and upright a man as I believe Col. Ingersoll to be in his family relations, but once admit that his views and principles as to the existence and attributes of the deity are true, and his morality is not praiseworthy, but merely an eccentricity. Fornication, adultery, incest, cannot be proved to be wrong, unless solely for the reason that God forbids, and consequently has made them so.

The consciousness of sin against God is, however, too firmly implanted in human nature to be ever eradicated by any speciousness of argument or to need argument to uphold it. The most degraded of savages ever discovered in the wilds of Africa or the brush of Australia, and the highest type of civilized man, feel and acknowledge this universal taint of sin against a power higher than themselves and to which they are responsible. And you know that every man is daily doing things which his mind tells him is wrong, and for which he condemns himself for doing even while in the act.

It is therefore not only irrational to deny that man is a sinner against infinite purity, holiness, and omnipotence, but is equally as irrational to cavil at the punishment meted out by his offended justice. It is not a pleasant subject to contemplate, and the everlasting perdition of an immortal soul is as awful and terrible a thing to me as it is to you—aye, far more so. But I did not create hell, and cannot abolish it; and since the Almighty has said that it is the fit doom of impenitent sinners, madly intent on rejecting his offers of mercy, "What am I that I should reply against the Lord? Shall not the judge of the whole earth do right?" Rest assured, however, that there will not be a hair-weight of punishment fall on any soul beyond what it has deserved in the judgment of infinite wisdom, justice, and mercy. God did not create hell, I might observe here, for man, but for the devil and his angels, according to the scriptures, and the same divine word is ever careful to distinguish that it is God who prepared the vessels of mercy to reach heaven, but it is men themselves who fit themselves for destruction. And to the principles of that final judgment who can object? "The revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds; to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation, and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first [on account of his greater privileges], and also of the Gentile; but glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile, for there is no respect of persons with God . . . in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ" (Rom. ii).

A sin against God, if we could realize it in its awful character, is the most hideous and terrible thing in the universe. Suppose one of yonder shining orbs should suddenly rebound from its orbit and "run lawless through the sky," would you be surprised that some awful catastrophe occurred, either the wrecking of the star itself, or the return of its whole system of suns, or even the universe, to chaos? Why? Because the inexorable laws which, under God, control the universe, would be overturned, and nothing but the omnipotent creator himself could prevent the destruction of the universe. As the swerving of a planet from its orbit, as the overturning of natural law in the material universe, so is sin in the moral world. The harmony of creation was destroyed, and for sin to be permitted without condign punishment would be similar to a universe without law—chaos in either case—one moral, the other material. In the case of sin, one of two alternatives must happen—God must abdicate and the infinite become powerless to govern the world he created, or the sin must be punished. In a court of justice, the prisoner is not allowed to decree his punishment. Should the sinner be allowed to estimate the extent of his guilt and define its punishment? Or is God the proper judge? And if to save men God is willing to accept the sacrifice of his own Son, surely men should not only be satisfied but be beyond measure grateful.

And now I will take up some prefatory remarks which you make, after observing that the scriptures repel as blasphemy the thought that God is the author of sin, or created man for the purpose of damning him. They utterly reject such a thought, and any reasoning that leads to such a conclusion is blasphemous perversion. I have read among Christian writers the same unhallowed conclusions, and I dare not trust myself to utter in words my utter loathing and abhorrence of such a thought. But the scriptures are not responsible for it. On many topics, such as the entrance of evil into the universe, and reasonings on it, they hav not gratified sinful curiosity. It is enough that it is here in our own world and they offer a remedy. I do not know the origin of sin in the universe—I cannot reason about it—but I know it is here and I want to escape it. I know God says it is not in him, and that the death of the sinner is not pleasure to him, and I bow in humility as I consider becomes finite ignorance, and cry, "'Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain unto it.'"

In your prefatory remarks you say, "A God who has the power to cause happiness to be the rule in the world must have the nature and cruelty of an incarnate fiend to inaugurate boundless grief, anguish, and pain, and to continue the means to make them perpetual. He is either not all-powerful, or he is not all-good." In the first place, God did not inaugurate such an awful state of things as you picture. He did, however, permit sin to enter, which was the forerunner and cause of it. Your objection, then, established on right premises, would be that a God having the power to prevent the entrance of sin in the world by absolute force, or being able to compel men by sovereign power to believe in Jesus Christ (since according to scripture that is the only way of escape), after sin has entered, is a fiend if he does not do it. Do you not think that if you had infinite wisdom and infinite love, too, you might have considered that, having created man perfect, with power to remain so absolutely, and having warned him of the consequences of disobedience, you might consider it wiser to leave it to the man to earn his own happiness?—to show obedience from love and not from coercion? In the judgment of perfect and infallible beings may not the former be adored as the wiser and more merciful course, even though it is mysterious to us? And as to the latter alternative, after sin has entered the world would you wish to be forced to believe in Christ? If by a train of providential circumstances you should be convicted of sin, and should feel upon you a moral force compelling you to pray to Jesus Christ in terror of soul, would you not resist it? You say such a God is either not all-powerful or he is not all-good. But his all-goodness may prevent him from using his all-powerfulness to esteem sin lightly and pass it over without punishment, or it may have made it more pleasing to him to use his all-powerfulness in making the man absolutely upright and capable of resisting every temptation, and leaving him to what he chose, in other words, moral obedience might please him better than inexorably necessitated conduct. Such might be used in keeping the sun in its orbit, or the farthest off star from losing itself in space, but to a spiritual and moral being a different and more glorious opportunity was given. Consider what Adam would have gained for himself and his race had he remained sinless—how inexcusable it was for him to sin—and God may after all have been (as he was) all-powerful and all-good in leaving him to his own choice. And even a man may believe the question of human happiness or human suffering, immensely important as it is, is not the most important consideration in the universe. If the question of vivisection were before us, and I were to insist that in absolutely no case should a lower animal be sacrificed for a higher; or if to save the life of a human being in a sinking boat it were necessary to fling a dog overboard; or if it were necessary to shut a drove of fast horses in a burning stable to prevent their madly trampling to death a multitude of guests escaping from an adjoining hotel, I fancy you would not consider the lower animals at too high a value. In the same way, questions of human suffering, and even, let me say with bated breath, eternal suffering, are questions of minor importance compared with the sovereignty of God. In winding up the paragraph you say, "If he made the devil with the full knowledge of all the wrongs he would commit, and all that the same devil would cause others to commit, he is infinitely worse than the devil and those he dupes." Now God did not make him a devil, although he undoubtedly knew all things that he would become and commit. Now let me ask you, do you suppose it godlike that God should cease to do his righteous will for fear of the consequence? In other words, if God chose to make angels and Adam on moral probation because he knew they would fall, was he to cease doing what pleased him?

You argue in defense of the relevance of your last letter that the God of the Bible "was noted for anger, jealousy, revenge, and cruelty, and if we are to believe he still rules over the affairs of this world he is still actuated by the same cruel, revengeful, and merciless motives." In a scriptural sense Jehovah is the jealous God; in fact in one place he names himself Jealous. I do not know that this is necessarily an evil attribute, especially since his jealousy is the entirely reasonable one of claiming all religious adoration being limited to him as the only true God and not being also paid to stones, idols, crosses, etc., intended to represent him, or imaginary deities, or the sun, moon, or stars, the woods, or the waters, his handiwork. What is the proof of your other charges? I suppose you will admit that as far as rules for practical life, for government and for social conduct, the laws of Moses, as they are called, if carried out by any nation, would make their country an Eden. Of course I do not include the sacrifices, religious ceremonies, and instructions as to the worship of Jehovah. Some of these rules I quoted in a letter or two back. I am safe in saying you find no fault with these. Your proof of the charges you make, then, are confined to certain commands of Jehovah in regard to the slaughter of certain nations, including little children. Inasmuch as these latter were miserable sinners deserving the judgment of Jehovah, I cannot see that he was worthy of that abhorrence you express for him. It was a severe punishment, but inasmuch as I feel that I myself am of myself worthy of the same, that it would be justice to have taken my life for my disobedience and hatred in years past, I cannot admit that you have proved your accusation. Neither you nor I know all the circumstances. If we did, and judged them rightly, we should probably wonder at the forbearance which spared them so long. But why did he slay infants? Well, perhaps to save them from becoming the same hardened wretches their parents were. Inasmuch as they were taken to heaven I cannot but believe it was a merciful deliverance.

You continue: "We see that sickness, pain, want, hunger, misery, and all the other evils stalk over the earth and your God of infinite power scarcely raises a finger to stop them. Innocence may suffer, beauty may languish, age may groan in agony, infancy may sicken, matrons and maidens may constantly suffer, millions may perish of starvation; famine, pestilence, and death may stalk over the earth without his making a single motion to stay it all. The arm of despotic power may strike down the helpless, robbers may despoil the needy, pirates may plunder and kill unfortunate voyagers, the strong hand of the assassin may murder the defenseless, widows and orphans may groan in hunger and destitution, but your God never interferes nor shows a scintilla of pity or mercy. He has not the time nor the inclination to attend to the needy and defenseless, he is too much occupied to clothe the naked, to feed the hungry, to strengthen the weak, to comfort the sorrowing, to strike down the oppressor and lift up the prostrate." In one sense this may be perhaps a caricature of the appearances of things, although thousands upon thousands could relate to you instances of deliverance from every kind of suffering in answer, as they believe, to prayers directed to the God of the Bible. But if your remarks have any weight at all they bear just as heavily against the God of Thomas Paine and all the teaching which the "Age of Reason" contains as to a God of mercy, love, etc. And did it not occur to you that you were exposing yourself to the reply courteous when you wrote of your idea of a God: "My idea of the God of this glorious old universe is immensely above that horrid Jewish monstrosity who is governed by passion, anger, revenge, malice, cruelty, vindictiveness, mercilessness, and spite. My God is guilty of none of these base things, and has made no hell to burn his creatures in and no devil to punish them under the fiery waves. My God is so much greater and grander than yours that I would not exchange for all the gold and diamonds in existence. Your God is a small, man-made affair, while mine is the boundless universe itself, including all matter and all force." It seems to me that this "boundless universe, including all matter and all force," is entirely careless of the sorrows and oppressions that happen on earth. Surely if there is no sin against your God, if he could create, make, or evolve human beings, he might hear the cries of human sorrow, might have created, made, or evolved a race to whom pain and suffering were unknown. And inasmuch as you do not know what future he has in store when this life is over, I fail to see that after all you have all the mercy, love, etc., in your idea of a God.

In regard to the putting to death of the Midianites I have shown you that the language does not necessarily have the construction you and others have put upon it, and that that construction is contrary to the express and positive commands of Jehovah in regard to such matters. You somewhat ungraciously grant the possibility of mine being the right interpretation. It is, I consider, mere prejudice that supposes any other.

In your paragraphs about the infinite there are some remarks with which I can agree, but there are others that are lamentably unscientific. After recounting some things which "we can imagine" or "think," you say: "It is going but a step farther to imagine that space has ever been occupied by matter in some form much as it is now. It is difficult to think of a time when space was without a particle of matter in it and remained so for decillions of ages, until less than six thousand years ago, some being having spoken it into existence. That is simply one of the crudest vagaries of mythology, or theology, as you prefer. It is reasonable to suppose that so long as space has existed this something has ever acted in obedience to its own inherent, eternal laws. As it is found that not an atom of matter can be brought into existence from nonentity, nor an atom can be destroyed or changed into nonentity, we can partially understand that matter is eternal and a part of the universe."

Before noticing how utterly it disagrees with the conclusions to which the facts asserted by even Infidel scientists inevitably lead, let me say that the Bible nowhere teaches that matter was spoken into being six thousand years ago. You say of matter that it "has ever acted in obedience to its own inherent, eternal laws." Let us hastily review the career of matter. If we accompany the geologist through his marvelous journey, he brings us to a period when there was absolutely no life upon the glowing mass of the earth and then leaves us. The chemist then breaks the crystals up into their original elements, and behind this there could not possibly have been any changes. Here, I say, upon authority that cannot be contradicted, and the truth of my remarks cannot be disproved—here I say, was the beginning of matter, and for the ages of eternity there was no matter in existence. You cannot truthfully escape this conclusion. You reply, "It is difficult to think of a time when space was without a particle of matter in it and remained so for decillions of ages." I say, here is the proof that it was so. For you affirm, and truthfully, that from its commencement matter "ever acted according to its own inherent laws." But chemical analysis brings us to a period and shows us a condition behind which there was no change nor action. There is only one conclusion—matter did not exist before that time. For if it existed it would have changed according to its inherent forces; and as there was no previous change to this primordial condition, it did not, as I have said, exist. Prof. Winchell says: "This condition of matter is necessarily primordial. As matter could not have remained in such a condition—as, in fact, it did not remain in such a condition—the career of matter must have had a commencement. Its evolutions are not from eternity. As its earliest existence involves an evanescent condition, the existence of matter had a commencement. It began to exist only when it began to change." While not believing myself all that the learned scientist quoted above teaches on other matters, the above is too positively proved to be overturned. No, sir, matter is not eternal, but created in time; scientists can trace it to the beginning of its existence, and your assertion that "matter is a part of the infinite," that it ever existed in space, etc., is hopelessly untenable.

In your answer to the inquiry as to what is the theological idea of the infinite you display certainly little candor or exactness. You define it to be "that he is an imaginary big thing in the form of a man who has a throne somewhere above our clouds, with his son sitting at his right hand, a multitude of angels surrounding him, with a full orchestra of harpists playing eternally before him, with 124,000 persons dressed in white constantly bowing before his throne, ever crying, 'Holy, holy, art thou, Lord, God of heaven and earth." What an utterly unpardonable burlesque of truth! Where is there any minister or any private Christian who believes any such conception—that God is in the form of a man? To be sure Jesus Christ is man in the heavens, being now there in a glorified body, but as to the scene you present, it is but a flippant caricature, the result of deplorable ignorance if you are honest, or contemptible trifling if you are not. You continue: "That old Jewish book tells us that its God has parts and organs. It speaks of his head, his face, his eyes, his nose or nostrils, his tongue," etc. Who but an Infidel could be caught by such a bait, or suppose that because there is such language as that "the Lord hides his face from the children of Israel," it is meant that he has a face like a man? etc. What utter surrender of reason and common sense! You talk in this very letter of dismissing the "myths of the ages of error to the gulf of forgetfulness," therefore forgetfulness is a physical reality, it has a gulf, it must be composed of land and water—this is on a par with your reasoning.

I am weary of noticing such quibbles—founded on the wilful blindness of mistaking such a common figure of speech as personification for a literal account. I need not remind you, however, at this day all natives of oriental countries are fond of this figure, and use it constantly. You know it, and I judge you also know that no believer in the Bible ever made the ridiculous blunder of taking them literally.

I am weary of noticing, as I hav said, all the erroneous statements made in your letters, and consequently allow many of them to pass unchallenged. Thus what you call the "little, miserable, broken, mountainous country called Palestine," had in Volney's time (and now), according to his statement, all the capabilities and natural advantages to become in the hands of proper care the most fertile spot of all the earth. It has, as no other one country in the whole world has, the climate known to every part of the world, and produces vegetables and fruits which to bring together elsewhere would need every country to be searched. "The crude, restless, warlike, semi-barbarous nation of Arabs," as you contemptuously style the Jews, have been the people who have been, in God's hands, a blessing to all other nations, for to them originally the oracles of God were committed, and all civilization, happiness, and goodness was wafted over the world from this spot.

In attempting to eradicate from man's heart the belief in, love of, and obedience to God, you take from them the corner-stone, which is the foundation of the whole structure of truth, and which alone makes life worth living. This is very ingenuously and conclusively proven in Mr. Mallock's popular work, "Is Life Worth Living?" the last three chapters of which are, however, sadly marred by his bias toward the papacy. The other chapters are, however, beyond refutation. Take away from me my trust in God, and my existence is a mockery and a curse. There is nothing can fully satisfy my heart but God; family, wealth, fame, pleasure, kind deeds, all eventually lose their attraction and fail to satisfy the cravings of my soul. Every honest and unselfish man must realize the feelings of John Stuart Mill, one of the purest of Atheists, "From the winter of 1821," he says in his "Autobiography," "when I first read Bentham, . . . I had what might truly be called an object in life—to be a reformer of the world. . . . I endeavored to pick up as many flowers as I could by the way; but as a serious and permanent personal satisfaction to rest upon, my whole reliance was placed on this." I think these words describe your position and hope very exactly, and I have read the same idea from several writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker. But mark, he continues: "But the time came when I awakened from this as from a dream. . . . It occurred to me to put the question directly to myself: 'Suppose that all your objects in life were realized, that all the changes in institutions and opinions which you were looking forward to could be completely effected in this very instant, would these be a very great joy and happiness to you? And an irrepressible self-consciousness distinctly answered, No.' At this my heart sank within me, the whole foundation on which my life was constructed fell down. . . . The end had ceased to charm, and how could there ever again be any interest in the means? I seemed to have nothing left to live for." And he adds afterward, commenting upon it: "The destiny of mankind was ever in my thoughts, and could not be separated from my own. I felt that a flaw in my life must be a flaw in life itself, and that the question was whether if the reformers of society and government could succeed in their objects, and every person in the community were free and in a state of physical comfort, the pleasures of life being no longer kept up by struggles and privation, would cease to be pleasures. And I felt that unless I could see some better hope than this for human happiness in general my dejection must continue." Solemn, but truthful, words these, which describe in uninspired language the condition of those who are comprehended in the pithy sentence of revelation, "without hope and without God in the world."

But I am extending this letter to a tiresome length. There are a few things in your concluding remarks that I hope to take up in my next reply.

Faithfully yours, G. M. MAIR.

League Notes.

A member of the Lookout Liberal League of Mitchell and Jewell counties, Kansas, writes us that the 29th of January was remembered by them, and an address on the general life and character of Thomas Paine, by H. Hersey, of Cawker City, was attentivly listened to by a small but appreciativ audience on Sunday at 11 o'clock.

The winter there, as elsewhere, has been rather severe, and sickness prevailing to some extent throughout the district has prevented them from meeting as often and regularly as they could hav wished. But the germ of Liberalism has not frozen out, and as spring approaches animation will probably return, and they will be able to sing, "Revive us Again!"

In the report he says: "We hav experienced some difficulty in getting the doors of our various schoolhouses in the different districts opened to Liberal lectures, and always hav to obtain the consent of the school board for that purpose; but strange to say, when an orthodox minister comes along neither the keys of St. Peter nor the public authorities are demanded; the doors voluntarily swing back on their hinges. However, we hav a lecturer, one of our charter members, Mr. E. Gard, whose able and profound eloquence always attracts attention and despite Christian prejudice and influence. His addresses are invariably listened to by full houses." So much for mental liberty.

To blurt out our opinions at all times and in all places, regardless of surroundings and possible consequences, is certainly most selfish and unwise, but when appealed to for our private judgment or opinion, why should we lie about it either by suppression or evasion? It is disheartening to think how common this sort of cowardly and thoughtless dishonesty is, and how evil and pervasiv in its consequences. —Exchange.

Discussion.

Our Fourteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I must withhold from this the praise accorded you in my last letter for your discretion in not attempting the defense of your God. In your last your defense is not a happy one, and it seems more and more proved that the less that is said in defense of your God, and the less apologies made for him, the better for his reputation. The conduct attributed to him will not bear examination, and is of such a character that the less said of it the better.

I must admit to you that I regard your apologies and arguments as decidedly lame and inconclusive. I cannot think our readers will have any difficulty in perceiving how weak is the cause you attempt to defend, how little of truth it really has to rest upon, and what a bundle of absurdities and falsehoods your entire system is. After reading over what you are able to say in defense of your system, it seems a marvel that a sensible person like yourself can really believe it. More than once has the question arisen in my mind, Does Mr. Mair really believe in the absurdities he preaches?

In fact your letter seems more like a pious sermon than sound argument. With its defects, however, I presume it is better than three-fourths of the sermons that emanate from the sixty thousand pulpits all over the country. When I think of the aggregate of unproved assumptions, illogical pretensions, and improbable nonsense that every Sunday are belched forth from all the pulpits in our land I grieve for the mischief of the priesthood and the credulity and stupidity of the masses.

In your attempt to apologize for God's placing misery in the world you try to make it appear that he is not the author of sin, the devil, and all the ills that exist. But that will not do; according to your own creed he is the author of the authors of them and with the full and perfect knowledge that sin and misery would be the result of his experiments. If he did not want sin and misery in the world, why are they here? If he did not want them, why did he create the very agencies which he knew would produce them? Why did he create an angel of light which he knew would rebel against him and produce evil and misery inconceivable? Why did he create man and woman when he positively knew they would go to the bad the very first step they took and that their offspring would sin against him forever?

Why did he make that snake and give him the power of speech when he knew just as well as that he himself existed that that snake would ruin the man and woman, and drag them and their offspring into eternal crime and suffering? If he made the snake and made man and woman with the full knowledge of the wrongs they would commit, he was just as guilty as though he had planned the whole matter of making sin and crime and compelled the results to be just as they were. If he made the factors, knowing all the time what the results would be, he was just as culpable as though he had decreed that things should be just as bad as they are. There is no difference at all. If he produced the conditions which he knew would cause eternal wretchedness on the part of countless millions, it was just as bad in him then to go ahead in his project as though he wished the result to be as direful as it is. He either wished things to be as bad as they are or he had not the power to prevent it, turn and twist and dodge all you will. And in either case he is such a monstrosity or such an imbecile as no sensible person ought to respect.

If your God is opposed to the devil, if he does not like the way he is decoying and enticing men and women into sin and misery, why does he not stop it? If he does not like the way things are going in his world, why don't he change the programme? If he does not like the devil and the way in which he is consigning millions to utter wretchedness and pain, even if he did not make him for a devil in the first place, why don't he destroy him now and put an end to his horrible career? If he created the devil at first, is he unable to uncreate him now? As Gerald Massey and many others have earnestly inquired, "Why don't God kill the devil" and thus end all the terrible mischief he is continually doing? He either don't want to kill him or he can't; nor can you wriggle out of that. If he don't want to kill the devil nor stop his evil work, he is just as bad as the devil is, and even worse. If he does want to end his career of worse than infamy, he is powerless to overcome him and no longer ought to be worshiped. The devil is the more respectable of the two, and he is the one we ought to pay our adorations to, if to either.

If God did not want affairs in this world to get all snarled up the way they are, it only remains that he did not know how things would come out, or he had not the power to prevent it. I must repeat that the existence of endless unhappiness and suffering is a clear proof that he is unable to prevent them or has not the disposition to do so; it is a disproof of his omniscience or his omnipotence, or both. This cannot be effectually disputed; so long as it is claimed that the God of theology is the author of all the factors in existence, of all the conditions that have ever arisen, with the full knowledge of what the result of everything would be countless years before he made it, he cannot possibly escape the criminality of all the evils that exist. It is in vain for you to say that God is not the author of sin, is not the author of the devil, as such. If he is the author of all existences, and if he made everything with the tendencies and dispositions which they exhibit, and he knew just how every thing would act, he is absolutely the author of all the evil in existence to-day, and it is utter twaddle, special pleading, and silly falsehood to try to make the opposite appear.

I may repeat myself, but the sophisms and absurdities of theology have been so oft repeated that their falsehoods cannot be too frequently exposed, nor be too utterly denounced. It is in vain for you to say that sin has done all this evil we find in the world, but that God is not the author of sin. If he did not want sin to exist, why did he get up his creatures in such a way that he knew they would sin the first thing they did? If he did not want a devil, why did he create a being with the disposition to rebel and become a devil, and whom he knew would do just as he did do? You cannot escape this only common-sense conclusion that if sin and a devil do exist, the author of all things, possessing all foreknowledge, is the author of both of them. And if any one deserves to go to hell because of their existence, or for the harm they have produced, he is the very person that ought to burn. It will be the grossest injustice if it is not so.

If you construct a huge machine, which you know has the power to crush and kill every person who comes near it to operate it or to look at it, and you know that that result cannot be avoided, you are guilty of taking every life thus destroyed; you are a murderer of the most criminal character. If a railroad company constructs a bridge in such an imperfect manner that they know that the first heavy train that passes over the bridge will inevitably crush it and fall through and the two hundred persons on board be dashed to death in the ravine one hundred and fifty feet below, that company and those bridge builders would be guilty of the murder of every person so destroyed, and no jury could escape that decision. And that is just what your God is doing. He is millions of times worse than all the trap-bridge builders and the infernal machine makers that ever existed. He made man at first with all his ignorance, all his incentives, all his evil inclinations, all his propensities, with the positive knowledge of the course he would take; he set the trap he knew would catch his creatures; he made the devil to lure them into the trap, knowing he would surely do the luring, and then he turns around and pretends to be very mad or angry because his imperfect creatures fall into the trap he set for them, and he decides to burn them in hell for it for countless millions of years. Oh, what a horrible doctrine! What a fearful God! What a monstrous system of religion! What a stupid or criminal set of ninnies who stand up and defend such a monstrous falsehood and pretend to love such a God and claim to think it would be an eternity of joy passed in his presence! Let me give you notice now that I do not wish to be counted in that select company. I could not love nor respect such a God, and I would not wish to pass a moment in his presence. I should much prefer the devil, and believe him far the better of the two.

The God whom you imagine you believe in, according to theology, has for six thousand years been taking life under the most cruel and relentless circumstances. He has caused the death of hundreds of millions of aged people midst such pain and agony as would seem sufficient to touch the heart of a stone, and still he is never moved by pity, and never lifts a finger to prevent this suffering. Countless millions of men and women in the prime of life hav been removed from the stage of action, and under the infliction of such sickness and suffering as are painful to contemplate. They have been stricken down with pestilence and disease, they have been prostrated for days, weeks, and months in the direst agony until death finally came to their release, while millions have died by famine and slow starvation. Just think of the aggregate of suffering that has been endured by this class—think how they have famished for the want of a mouthful of food, and how they have prayed and groaned for it, but it was not vouchsafed to them. This God of yours sat serenely and composedly a little way above the tops of the trees, looking down without pity upon those suffering mortals, whom he could relieve as easily as he could turn over his hand, but would not do it. He was more than willing they should suffer and die, and burn in hell forever afterward. Oh! what a God!

Hundreds of millions have died upon the battle-field, at the hands of their fellow-men. War-clubs, spears, javelins, engines, swords, pikes, poisoned arrows, cross-guns, muskets, bayonets, rifles, cannon, and every conceivable implement of destruction have been brought into service for the purpose of slaying the human race, causing suffering and death, and leaving millions upon millions of helpless mothers and children to suffer and starve in consequence. Think for a moment of the exquisite agony that wretched and vanquished warriors have suffered on the field of battle, their famished and bleeding bodies lying helpless and forsaken in the burning sun or in the biting frost until death ended their misery. Think of the millions that have died in captivity, a prey to the most foul and loathsome diseases arising from hardship, exposure, suffering, and starvation. Think of the vast amount of human blood that has been shed upon the battle-fields of the world—think how it has flowed in rivers—how the earth has again and again for thousands of times been saturated with this life-fluid, and how enough of human blood has been shed in war to make an ocean of large dimensions, far more than enough to float all the boats and ships ever built, and the God you love has looked smilingly upon it all. He has even delighted in it, ordering many wars to be waged among his children, stirring up their passions to sanguinary conflicts, calling himself "the Lord of Hosts," "the God of Battles," "the God of War," and all that sort of thing, and even his son seemed a friend of the sword, for he commanded his disciples to procure one each, even if they had to sell their garments to procure it. Oh! what a God! How fond of blood and carnage! How fond of human suffering and misery!

Millions of human beings have been mangled and devoured by wild beasts, torn by wolves, and devoured by vultures, which God had made, knowing they would treat his children in that way. Think of the aggregate of human agony which has thus been produced! Think of the immense numbers who have been bitten and poisoned by venomous serpents, adders, reptiles, poisonous insects of numerous kinds, all made by this same God, with the full knowledge of the human lives they would destroy and the human suffering they would cause! Oh, what a God to love and adore! What an object to worship!

Millions of human beings in the name of this God, and by those who pretended to be his servants, have been dragged to prisons, to inquisitions, and to dungeons, where they have eked out miserable days, weeks, months, and years, and this God has never interfered to save them from such a terrible fate; while other millions have been tortured with racks, pulleys, and wheels, their joints have been pulled apart with these godly inventions, their bones have been broken inch by inch, their feet have been crushed with iron boots, their ears cropped, their eyes put out, their noses cut off or smashed level with the face, their tongues pulled out by the roots, their flesh filled with slivers of pitch and they burnt to their very stumps; boiling oil has been poured into their ears, their finger and toe-nails have been pulled out with pincers, they have been hung up by their heels, by their thumbs, and with their arms behind them; their mouths have been filled with huge gags and blocks of wood for days together, heavy weights have been placed upon their bodies, rendering breathing almost impossible, and slowly and painfully crushing their lives away; and millions of these most unfortunate wretches, after enduring these terrible and almost inconceivable tortures, have been dragged to beheading-blocks, to scaffolds and to stakes, when their miserable existences have ended by their heads being severed from their bodies, their being hung and strangled by ropes, or slowly burnt to cinders and ashes by the cruel fire, which was still more merciful than your God who caused all this, and then promises to burn their poor souls in hell for endless millions of years—forever and forever! All this has been done in the name of your God and his illegitimate son and neither of them has ever been known to interpose in a single instance to save one of these unfortunate wretches from their awful fate. Not once have they shown aught else but acquiescence and approval. What heartless, unfeeling monstrosities! What horrible gods to love and worship!

Hundreds of millions of young men and women in the morning of life, in their very youth, when vigor and hopes were buoyant, have been stricken down by the heavy hand of disease, and after severe and painful sickness the cold hand of death has been laid upon them and they taken from the field of usefulness and from the domain of hope and expectation with the purpose of their lives unfulfilled and the promise of existence broken. It is the God of theology that has done this, regardless of the regret of these untimely departures, and the grief of friends at the loss. He has done it with the same apparent remorselessness as that with which a hawk pounces upon and devours a chicken. Oh, what a God!

Hundreds of millions of little children and innocent babes of tenderest years, without an opportunity of making any returns for having been born into the world, with no record made, no matured life enjoyed, no chance afforded them for doing a little good in life—like tender buds nipped by the biting frost—have been snatched by the hand of death, serving little purpose save the endurance of a mass of acute suffering, leaving an aching, painful void in the hearts of fond and hopeful parents, a sundering of the fondest ties known to the human heart, a relentless exhibition of cruelty without a compensation of any kind. Yes, vast numbers of little innocents, not yet able to speak their mother's name, and to do little more than give the smile of recognition, have been seized by the hand of death without the slightest regard for the yearnings of affection and love; millions upon millions of mothers have in pain and anguish brought their little ones only to sicken, to perish, and die, like the flower of a day, with no compensation for all their suffering. God it is, according to the Christian creed, who hath taken every life that has been taken for all these thousands of years. Every aged person dies by his hand; every man and woman who dies in mature life and does not reach the autumn of existence, is taken away by him; every stalwart young man, every charming young woman, every robust youth, every smiling maiden, every child, every infant, every dimpled babe whose life is cut short, is taken away by him. He, according to the Chistian belief, takes all this hopeful life, and fills with unnecessary grief and sorrow every heart of man, woman, and child! There is not one that has not its own sorrow and unhappiness! Oh, what a God! What a taker of life! What a torturer!

As dark and as horrible as you Christians paint your devil, your God is infinitely worse! He has made all the conditions for evil, he causes all the unhappiness, he induces all the suffering, he causes all the death. He takes life in every instance, while the devil has never taken a life. As powerful as he is to thwart and defeat his maker, as influential as he is to draw the whole world into his service, there is no proof that he has ever attempted to take the life of man, woman, or child. There is no proof that he has ever tried to injure man or woman in any way. He never deprived them of their property nor endeavored to cheat them out of what was justly theirs. He has been defamed by being called a great liar, he has even been called the "father of liars," but this is only base slander, without a particle of proof to rest upon. There is no proof that he ever told a single lie. The one laid to him while he was a snake was no lie at all. He simply corrected a misrepresention which God had made to Adam, when he told him that on the day that he ate of that wonderful fruit he would surely die. The devil assured Eve that she would not die, but that her eyes would be opened. This proved strictly true. They did not die on the day they ate the fruit, but lived over nine hundred years after. So the devil told the truth and it was God who did the fibbing.

In the Job-tormenting business they seem to have been equal partners. They entered into a regular contract, and the way they treated that poor old man was a shame to both. But ever since that time the devil has shown himself the fast friend to the human race God has ever tried to hold the race in ignorance, while the devil has given them a fondness for investigation and inquiry. He has brought out all the great inventions which have done so much to help the world, if the words of Christians can be taken on the subject. They have said he was the inventor and teacher of the greatest of all arts, printing, which has done so much to spread knowledge over the world. The invention of steam applied to machinery has been attributed to him, and so of nearly all mechanical inventions. It does not appear that his eternal opponent was ever the author of one. Even your Presbyterian brethren of Scotland used to denounce the fanning-mill as an invention of the devil. The wind thus produced for cleaning their oats and beans they called "the devil's wind." And even within my own memory friction matches, now so generally used in all parts of the civilized world, were called an invention of the devil, and in consequence for many years they were called Lucifer matches in honor of Lucifer, the devil. In like manner, education, science, and art have been attributed to the devil by Christians, and thus upon their authority he has been man's best friend. As a matter of justice I will ask you to point out a single instance where he has been guilty of a mean, ungentlemanly action. Do you know of his trying to hurt any one's character? Did he ever commit adultery? Did he ever turn over all the little girls of a massacred nation to gratify the brutal lusts of soldiers and murderers? Did he ever attempt to seduce a young girl, to overshadow her, and then cause the cruel death of the resultant offspring? Did he ever get mad and curse? Did he ever get angry, or show that he was fickle, revengeful, and malicious?

According to your own theory it will have to be decided that he has been a patient, charitable, well-disposed being, though he has been maligned, slandered, and abused more than any other being who has had an existence. Compared with his opponent he is long-suffering, genial, good-natured, merciful, and benificent. I hardly need tell you that I do not believe that such personalities as Yahweh or the devil have an existence, but if I must accept either of these imaginary characters as a companion or as a being to love and worship I will take Lucifer every time.

You say, "God did not create hell for man, but for the devil and his angels." This will hardly do. Do not make such a blundering ninny of your God as to claim that he raised hell for one class of his creatures and then decreed another class to occupy it; or that he is not able to carry out his original plan as to the wretches who should people hell. It will not do to claim that he knew countless ages before he made hell that billions of his children of the human species were to occupy it, and still that he did not make it for them. It adds nothing to his good character to deny that he created it for men and women, but claim that he prepared it for the devil and his angels, equally beings of his own creation. If he made it for one set of his creatures, it showed just as much mercilessness and hardness of heart as if he had made it for another set; besides, as it seems to be extensive enough to hold all of his creatures, devils, and men, and as he has decreed nearly all of them to occupy it, it is very fair to conclude that he meant it for all. If he cannot accomplish his purposes he is not much of a god.

So, in the matter of raising hell among his subjects, he may be said to far outdo all the other gods that anybody knows anything about. You may well profess "utter loathing and abhorrence of such a thought;" but what are you going to do about it? Your God, according to your own theory, is resposible for everything that has taken place, and every evil that exists, and there is no use in your pretending to be shocked at it. If you will believe in such a God, you must accept all that belongs to him. You had better look the shocking evil square in the face and be reconciled to it as a part of your "beautiful," "heavenly" system.

You profess to be very much shocked because I dwelt briefly upon the Bible idea, the Jewish idea, and the Christian idea that Yahweh has a body, and parts and organs. You ask, "Who but an Infidel could be caught by such a bait?" and exclaim, "What utter surrender of reason and common sense!" I am compelled to think your absurdity has no bounds. If the Bible teaches anything, it is the anthropomorphism of Yahweh, and nine-tenths of the Christians I have met with believe that he has the parts and organs of a man. In the very first chapter of the Bible we are told that "God created man in his own image." If this means anything, it means that God had an image, a form, with parts and organs similar to those he gave man. And this is proved true by the Christian theory further on, for when he cohabited with the little Jewish maiden he begot a son with parts and organs the same as ordinary men. If the father was without form or image, without body, parts, and organs, the son would also necessarily be without body, parts, and organs. As the infinite is immeasurably superior to the finite he must of necessity have so far superceded woman as to have decided the character ard shape of the young god. He being the absolute parent and Mary simply furnishing the mold, the offspring, according to the theory, must be held to look like and be like the father. So, if the son is anthropomorphic, you have no right to deny that the father is anthropomorphic, just because it destroys the idea of infinity.

Why, the idea of the anthropomorphism of God runs all through the Bible, and I am astonished that you should pretend to be shocked because I refer to it. I am very sure that the writers of the Bible believed that God had parts and organs, and that fully nine-tenths of those who believe the Bible to-day think the same. If he has no parts or organs, the most egregious impositions and falsehoods have been palmed off upon those who hav accepted the book as true. Those writers had no idea that a nondescript nothing or something without body and organs could see, hear, talk, and perform deeds of all kinds. How could a being see without eyes, hear without ears, speak without tongue, walk without feet and legs, strike without arms, lead without hands, and all the rest of it?

Among the early interviews which Abraham had with God was the one in the plains of Mamre, when he appeared in the form of a man. Abraham invited him and his two companions into his tent, where they washed their feet and ate of fresh meat just killed and cooked, cakes, butter, milk, etc. God and Abraham talked together some time about the wicked people of Sodom, etc. Now if God had not body and parts, a great imposition was played upon Abraham, or the story is all a lie. If God has not body and parts, it is a falsehood about Jacob wrestling with him a good share of a night and getting his hip put out of joint in the contest. If God has not body and parts, it is all a lie about God placing Moses in the cleft of a rock, covering him with his hand while he passed by, thus preventing Moses from seeing his face, but showing him his back parts after he had passed. It is very clear that if he had back parts, which Moses saw, he had front parts and other parts constituting a body. He must have had body and parts, or the story about Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel going up on a mountain and seeing the God of Israel, and that his feet stood upon paved work of sapphire stone, is all a falsehood.

If the Jewish God had not body and organs, it was simply the grossest falsehood for the parts of his body to be mentioned in scores upon scores of places —every time that his face, his eyes, his ears, his nose, his mouth, his tongue, his breath, his voice, his arms, his hands, his body, his loins, his legs his feet, and his back parts are spoken of are falsehoods and delusions. When there is such an array of proof in the Bible that its God had body and parts it is quite improper for you to become so indignant at my presuming to allude to the matter, simply using the authority which the Bible affords.

Neither should you accuse me of burlesquing because the printers inserted 2 in place of 4 in giving the number of redeemed worshipers. It should have been 144,000 instead of 124,000, a difference of just 20,000. In Rev. xiv you will find this number given, with allusions also to the band of harpists singing before the throne, and the beasts and elders. In chapter iv more is given of the vision of the throne, with one upon it like a jasper or sardine-stone, with a rainbow in sight, and very strange beasts full of eyes, and four and twenty elders in white raiment. If possibly I got the heavenly picture a trifle mixed, it cannot be said, at all events, that he that sitteth upon the throne "is no sardine."

It cannot be denied that as time progresses the original, crude ideas of God are attempted to be superceded by those more spiritual and refined, and you exhibit this tendency. Instead of a local finite being with body and parts you would have it that he is the infinite. When he walked in the Garden of Eden in the cool of the day and wished to see how his young pair were progressing he seemed totally oblivious as to what they had done or where they were. He was under the necessity of calling for them before he could find them, and it was not till he saw the aprons upon them that he had the slightest suspicion of the mischief they had been into. This was a crude idea of the omniscience of an infinite God. His finite power and knowledge, his ignorance, is portrayed in the account of his being under the necessity of "coming down" and making personal observation as to the wickedness of the people of Sodom. He had heard reports of it, but he had to come down and see for himself before he could know with certainty. It was probably similar when he "came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men had builded." Now it is thought that God by a glance can see everything on the earth, but in those early times it was necessary to "come down" and make personal inspection in order to know how it was. It was similar when he wished to know whether Abraham would obey orders and offer up his son Isaac. With his infinite knowledge he seemed incapable of telling without putting the old man to an absolute test. He is getting more knowing nowadays and can tell anything "in a flash." Yes, God is improving in his omnipotence, his omniscience, and his infinity. But you cannot escape the fact that the Bible teaches his anthropomorphism.

You are mistaken when you say I ungraciously grant that Yahweh did not give the young orphan girls of Midian to the Israelites for concubines. I only temporarily made the concession to get your opinion as to whether it was right to massacre the men, to put the women and male children to death in cold blood, to commit wholesale robbery, and to turn the little girls over to slavery. You dodge the question, so I must go back to the original Bible position that when Moses spoke for Yahweh of the women-children "keep alive for yourselves," he meant that they might make concubines of them. There is no other sensible conclusion to come to. And I must repeat that the whole affair was one of the most monstrous crimes ever committed at the command of a God, and I cannot honor the man who will defend it or approve of it. There is not the slightest proof that the Midianites were any more sinful than other nations, even the Jews themselves, and to butcher and persecute them in that manner was most terrible and merciless.

You ask if I believe there is such a thing as sin. I answer no, not in the sense you do. You believe sin to be an offense of a finite being against an infinite being. As I do not believe in an infinite being nor in the possibility of a finite having the ability to injure the infinite, I cannot believe as you do on the subject of sin. I believe that crime and wrong exist in the world, and that men are guilty of them. Lying, theft, robbery, murder, arson, adultery, etc., etc., are wrong, not because man thereby injures the infinite, but his fellow-man. Man can injure his fellow-beings and himself, but not the infinite, and therefore he cannot sin against him. He can only sin against those he can injure. The infinite God and the infinite devil are beyond his reach.

As regards the fertility of the valleys of Palestine, I am willing to admit that they once bore fair crops. Probably Volney was right in his description; but if every word was true that does not disprove that the country was only forty miles wide and one hundred and forty long. It is little more than half the size of the state of Vermont and something of such a mountainous country. Half of its surface is abrupt mountains and hills. In its palmiest days, soon after Yahweh gave it to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it signally failed, for several years, to produce bread stuffs for its inhabitants, and had it not been for the heathen land of Egypt Jacob and his seventy Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER V.

"One day," so related our abbé, "I received the order to go into the hospital of the Bagno to prepare an old galley-slave for death. The physicians had given up all hope to save him, so also had the clergy of the hospital. The latter found in the gray sinner a heretic, who absolutely would not be converted. I, at that time, was considered a learned man. The captain of the galley, Mr. Delaubin, seemed to esteem this slave, and as he knew me personally, he entreated me to care for the salvation of the soul of the hardened sinner. As little as I felt inclined to lead an apostate back into the bosom of the church, yet I consented. My curiosity had been aroused because it was generally asserted that this heretic was completely possessed by the devil, worse than Calvin, and confounded the most skilled heathen-converters.

"I went. Odd enough, thought I to myself on the way, and could not refrain from laughing; one Freethinker shall here convert the other. Had the pious captain of the galley known me better he would not hav insisted so. But so we carry on sad mummery in life. No one of all mortals, even if he were the wisest and most virtuous, has courage enough to go through life without a mask.

"I was led into the room of the sick galley-slave. There he sat, wrapped in an old cloak, with his face turned toward the open window, in the full sunshine, as if to warm himself in it, and, at the same time, enjoy the pleasant view into the open air. He turned his head toward me. I shall not forget this pale, saintly face as long as I liv. Here was not the gloomy, staring look of the common criminal, or the shameless audacity of confirmed vice, and the dull remorse and dejection of punished but not improved wickedness; no, it was the calmness of an unembarrassed, pure soul, the goodness of innocence, which spoke out of those large, beautiful eyes. The countenance of the unfortunate, affected by every kind of weather and bleached by sickness, had, as much as it was the countenance of a sufferer, nevertheless something noble and winning in all its features. In the neck of the closely-shaven head a few gray hairs were yet visible, which to the head, even the head of a criminal, lent a venerable aspect. Enough, I was at this sight strangely affected. So I had not expected to find this man.

"I approached him. 'Pardon me,' said he, 'I can not show you my respects. You see my feet there stretched upon that straw cushion. They are already swollen up to my knees.' I stepped up to him and asked him his name. He called himself Alamontada, named to me his birthplace, and at the same time, that he, in the prime of his years, had been condemned to the galley, and had served out his punishment within half a year. He had then been a galley-slave for nearly twenty-nine years.

"'Well for thee,' said I to him; 'then thou wilt soon be at liberty, thou wilt see again thy home, and canst the rest of thy days liv like an honest man.'

"'I shall not again see my home!' said he, with quivering voice, 'I hav no home in this world—they hav robbed me of it. I long for the quiet land of the grave. I know it well, death is more friendly with me than life. He will now not tarry so long as he has thus far tarried.'

"So talked the slave. I admit that the general dignity, the select language, and the soft voice, so full of significance, touched me just as much as it embarrassed me. Everything convinced me that this one, cast out of human society, was none of the common kind of galley-slaves; that he formerly, at least, must hav enjoyed a good education, the marks of which he had faithfully preserved, even in the society of outcasts, wherein he had spent almost the half of his life.

"'Believest thou also,' I continued, 'believest thou also, Alamontada, that thou wilt not liv to see thy freedom?'

"'I at least hope,' he answered, 'that death will free me from the burden of my days before the law frees me from these chains.'

"'And thou canst really think with such great tranquillity of death? Hast thou so used the time of thy punishment that thou canst hope to be fully reconciled to the Judge of the living? Behold, Alamontada, Captain Delaubin has much compassion for thee. He believes himself that thou wilt number only a few more days. I come, in reality, induced by him, to see thee, in order—'

"Alamontada interrupted me. 'The grace of our captain moves me deeply; also your philanthropy, dear sir, I honor. But I pray you most humbly to entreat my lord to send no more clergymen, but to grant to my hours the consolation of solitude. Shall and must I then be deprived even of this consolation? If it can serve your satisfaction, I declare once more, that I hav been prepared these three and twenty terrible years for the beautiful moment of my death; that I die without sorrow; that I do not tremble before the Judge of the dead. But can my petition not be granted, then I beg to wait until my last hour, when the eucharist and extreme unction may be administered.'

"He said this with such heartfelt, entreating voice that I without hesitation gave my word to intercede for him. Among others I thereby involuntarily expressed the thought that it were a duty to honor the wishes of the dying, and were he an Atheist, he should not be brought into heaven against his will.

"'You are a clergyman?' said he. 'Your mildness pleases me more than all the admonitions of your predecessors. You giv me rest, and make me master of my most precious hours, the last ones. To a man like you, full of toleration, compassion, and understanding, the gratitude of even a galley-slave may not be disagreeable.'

"I gave him to understand that I wished to be able to do more for his consolation, and that it deserved no thanks not to trouble him with theological speculations, if they were against his inclinations. I dropped these remarks in order to draw out this odd man still more. He looked at me with an expression of astonishment, and exclaimed after a pause, 'Dear sir, you are an extraordinary man!'

"'Extraordinary?' said I, 'I find nothing extraordinary in the fulfilment of the highest duties of every man.'

"'Even in that consists the extraordinary,' said he.

"I demanded of him to explain himself more fully. He seemed to hesitate, and asked with timidity if I would not be angry if he would speak frankly. I assured him that it would please me very much. Thereupon he said:

"'Dear sir, if the common man does his duty, he verily does not deserve to be praised. But the man whom rank and dignity elevate above his fellowmen, hardening his heart and paralyzing his judgment, deserves admiration if he remains unprejudiced and true to human nature. Therefore should we in born kings praise every virtue; in the soldier, sympathy for suffering; in the lawyer, justice; in the clergyman, respect for different opinions.'

"I did not think that I ought to take offense at this judgment, expressed by an old galley-slave. And yet that man, through this and all else that he spoke, became more important to me. I penetrated him further. I was fortunate enough to gain his confidence. I learned that in his youth he had devoted himself to the study of the sciences, and had been led away from them to the galley-bench. Whatever his crime might hav been, he had atoned severely enough therefor. But, as much as curiosity burned in me, I thought it my duty to spare to the unfortunate the memory of his transgressions, in the last moments of a sorrowful existence.

"My conversation seemed to hav been agreeable to him. He begged me humbly to repeat my visit. 'I am not worthy of this favor,' said he, 'but your kind heart beats for the miserable. Even the slave is still a man and your brother. I am a disgraced one, and without property. Before my right arm was shot off, I could sometimes write. The leaves upon which I hav written my lamentations, under tears, hav been been left in my possession. These leaves I will bequeath to you as a legacy. Perhaps they will become dear to you.'

"I complied with his wishes. I visited him daily. Our conversation soon turned to the loftiest objects of humanity. O you beloved ones! this despised one soon raised himself before me to the rank of the most venerable mortals. He, whom I was to convert from his errors, converted me. His wisdom became in the nights of life my guiding star. His virtue sanctified me again. I never left the divine slave without being improved, and in the solitude of my room I noted down the conversations which we had held. Come, I impart to you Alamontada's conversations. Thus I honor his memory in the most beautiful manner. What you hav heard from me so far consider as an introduction to all. The condition of your souls is the same that I brought with me to the dying slave. What he at that time spoke to me consider it as if spoken to you."

With these words Abbé Dillon arose. We walked in silence along the shore of the lake. The sun sank down, and shadows crept over the earth. Roderick and I were gloomy. Dillon had broken the slender reed upon which our spirit, thus far, had still leaned, in order not to perish in the pangs of anxious doubts. We tottered without support, and clung tightly to Dillon's lofty, firm spirit, like feeble children to their father.

When we had come into the abbé's room, and the candles had been lighted, he drew forth from under his papers a note-book. We seated ourselvs, and Dillon read.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

VIII.—The Rainbow.

TEXT.—And the bow shall be in the cloud, and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth.—Genesis ix, 16.

The destructiv torrents had ceased to fall, the windows of heaven were stopped, and the waters had returned from off the earth. The ark with Noah and his precious cargo rested upon Mount Ararat.

A world has passed away!

The utter desolation which Noah and his family beheld when he removed the covering from the ark, and the sense of loneliness they experienced, may be imagined. No pen can describe them.

After yet a long time, the Almighty, who in the press of other business engagements had in the mean time neglected the material preserved in the Ark for a fresh start, suddenly addressed Noah with that same familiarity which had characterized his personal intercourse with the inhabitants of the earth before the flood, saying, "Go forth of the Ark, thou and thy wife and thy sons and thy sons' wives with thee. Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all flesh, both of fowl and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, that they may breed abundantly in the earth and be fruitful and multiply upon the earth."

Noah obeyed until he got ashore, when he recalled the old love of the Almighty for the savor of burning flesh, and seizing upon a specimen of "every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, offered burnt offerings on the altar."

How in the name of common sense he could destroy one of every beast and fowl he had brought with him into the ark, and yet make no interference with the Lord's command that every beast and fowl should be fruitful and multiply, when Noah had embarked only a single pair of each kind, is one of those discrepancies which we are not called upon to explain. Possibly the injunction to multiply had been obeyed in advance in the ark. If that were so, Noah might hav made his burnt offerings without any serious interference with animal propagation; but he must also hav had a more disagreeably interesting time during his sojourn in the ark than has ever yet been supposed.

Noah had not miscalculated the Lord's weakness, for when he made the burnt offerings the Lord smelled the sweet savor and was overcome with delightful sensations to that extent that he said to himself in his heart, "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake." He even promised that while the earth remained, day and night should not cease. That, however, was an easy promis to keep, since it could not be broken without the manufacture of a second sun to take turn about with the other, thus producing continuous day; or else by the destruction of the one we hav, thus causing continuous night.

Recognizing his own short memory and vacillating habits, the Lord then put the rainbow in the clouds as a token of his covenant with the earth that flesh should not be cut off any more by a flood. And he ordained that it should come to pass that when he brought a cloud over the earth, the bow should be seen and he would remember his covenant.

From that day until the present time the bow is often seen in the clouds, and the faithful devotee consoles himself with the thought that never again will the world be submerged. He has the more comforting reflection that it will be burned, and that the souls of those who in life were not of his opinion will burn with it eternally in an unquenchable fire.

It is easy to make a common-sense explanation of the passages from which the text is selected. At the time when they were written, the nature of the rainbow was unknown among the ignorant people to whom they were published as the word of God. Superstition attributed it to a special act of deity, and Eastern imagination gave the superstition that poetic rendering which is reduced to common-place prose in Genesis. It was a phenonenon, and the poet pictured it as the evidence of a covenant with God.

Knowing as we do the causes which produce rainbows in clouds, the Bible story, except as a poetic fancy, is ridiculous. As well say that the transformation of mist into snow had its origin in a covenant and never occurred before the flood. As the rainbow effect is produced by a separation of the rays of light from the sun, to imagin that none existed before the flood is to assert that there were no clouds then, or that the sun's rays were incapable of being separated. There is no reason to doubt that what can be done now in the simplest manner, by the merest tyro in optics, could hav been done before the flood; and no greater nonsense was ever seriously promulgated than the idea that the rainbow, caused by the separation of the sun's rays as they pass through a cloud under certain natural conditions, was never observed by people who lived before the flood.

A little intelligent contemplation of this rainbow story in Genesis by any one of a candid mind will tumble another nursery idol from its pedestal.

Two Letters.

As samples of the sprightly correspondence which often appears in the valiant daily Truth, we giv the following:

PURIFICATION BY PERSECUTION.

To the Infidel Editor of Truth: Your ignorant and dastardly article on Immortality will not be noticed by the Rev. Dr. whom you so grossly insulted. I am a theological student, and having some leisure moments which cannot be better employed than in castigating such conceited ignoramuses as you show yourself to be every time you open your sinful and blaspheming mouth upon sacred subjects, I will proceed to show you how simple your nonsensical drivel is to educated and refined people.

With the blackguard bravado of a drooling idiot you assert that the existence of the soul cannot be proved. Well, you cannot prove any axiom. We know we hav a soul, we feel it throbbing in our veins. Our Professor of Mental Philosophy proves it to an absolute demonstration. Don't Elijah's appearing to Saul prove it? Don't the resurrection of Lazarus and Christ Jesus prove it? Don't the suffering of the good and the non-punishment of the evil in this life prove there must be an after life for rewards and retributions? You better read up Plato on immortality.

To do away with the belief in heaven and hell, you claim would make this world a paradise. And you repeat the threadbare story of some isolated cases where murderers hav apparently repented, and, on the gallows, rejoiced in the forgivness of their sins. But, you well know, the vast majority of murderers are Atheists or Materialists. Show me the thief who believes there is a God. Show me the libertine who believes there is a hell. Show me the suicide who believes there is a heaven, and show me the prostitute who believes in the Bible or ever attended Sabbath school. Such things as you, and the illiterate rabble who worship you, furnish all the criminals who infest society.

When we students ponder over these things, we cannot wonder at nor condemn the erstwhile so-called persecutions. That was the only way to purify society, and the time is coming when the earth will again be renovated in like manner. The slums, the thugs, the hoodlums, the saloon-keepers, and all grades of Infidels must be cut off. The Lord calls them cumberers of the ground; and he has deputed Christians to clean his threshing-floor. And they do not go to heaven, as you remark, for our God has said they may call but he will not hear; he will laugh at their calamity and mock when their fear comes.

And the word of the Lord is sure. TIMOTHY.

CYCLOPS GOES FOR TIMOTHY.

To the Religious Editor of Truth: The letter of "Timothy" in to-day's Truth proves "Timothy" to be a dangerous scoundrel. Such creatures as he brought untold misery upon the human race. Too stupid to think logically, and too brutal to tolerate another man's opinion beside theirs, they hav tyrannized and persecuted the best of mankind for centuries; but, fortunately, their reign is over. Science has disposed of their idiotical phantasmagories about "hell" and "heaven," "God" and "soul," and the acknowledgment of the equality of all men and women in regard to the freedom of thinking for themselvs has made superfluous a gang of obnoxious, lazy loafers called "priests" and "ministers," who used to dominate over the empires of the earth, but whose occupation is nowadays only one of sneaking, croaking hypocrits and swindlers.

I think any Freethinker compares favorably with that flat-headed, brainless fool, "Timothy," as far as tolerance and charity toward others are concerned. He is a more dangerous criminal than the thugs and hoodlums he desires to "cut off"—indeed, he ought to be locked up for safe-keeping. Not Freethinking, not Materialism, or philosophy hav produced crime, but Christianity, since eighteen hundred years has tolerated, has made it possible, that criminals, prostitutes, and Infidels could grow up among us. Every thief, every prostitute, every murderer in this and other Christian countries was raised by Christian parents; and in Spain and Italy, where the church was dominant over the state up to 1868, more crimes are committed than anywhere else. If "Timothy" were not a scoundrel, he would hav tried arguments instead of abuse. In my opinion, the religious views of Truth are sound, and its Sunday sermons are doing more good to the community than all the howling hypocrits from their pulpits can ever be expected to do.

I shake hands with you. CYCLOPS.

Our London Correspondence.

The champion of Freethought has again proved victorious, having been elected as a fit and proper representativ of the independent electors of Northampton, and although the majority he secured was not numerically large, it was quite sufficient to giv his friends a sense of elation at his success in triumphing over the narrow-minded bigots who so strenuously opposed him. His bitterest foes were of course connected with the religious party, who as usual with them in like cases stooped to the basest means of prejudicing the minds of others against him. Of course they lied plentifully, as they always hav done from the second century to the present time when they hav had any particular end to gain; but in this instance they rather overdid it, and so to a great extent defeated the purpose they had in view. Mr. Farley, "the converted butcher," who stated his intention of opposing Mr. Bradlaugh at the hustings, very wisely refrained from being nominated, or perhaps he could find no one to propose him, or back him with the necessary sinews of war. He therefore contented himself with writing scurrilous and maudlin pamphlets, and flooding the town with them. Of course his chief point was that Mr. Bradlaugh was an enemy of God, and as God was not able to help himself Mr. Varley entered the lists as his champion, but even with this very valuable assistance the Atheist obtained the victory. I dare say you know something of this pious individual, (he styles himself an "Evangelist") as when we were favored with the ministrations of Moody and Sankey, New York was blessed with a visitation from Varley. I am afraid, however, that he did not make much headway there, and was not so successful as his fellow-revivalists over here. This worthy presided the other evening at a butchers' tea-meeting in Spurgeon's tabernacle, and made a speech deploring the unregenerated condition of the unconverted butchers at Smithfield market. He was naturally anxious that they should be made to see the error of their ways, and stated that in the event of the good butchers taking the law into their own hands by knocking down a bad butcher who used profane language, or gambled or drank, he would willingly pay the fine which would be imposed by the magistrate for the assault. This little incident will giv you some idea of this truly holy man's character. You can easily see how his righteous anger would be aroused by a wicked man like Charles Bradlaugh, who does not believe in beating conviction into the heads of his opponents.

Mr. Bradlaugh has yet another difficulty to encounter before he takes his seat. He will not be allowed to take the oath quietly, but will be opposed by two or three champions of the church, one of whom belongs to a family drawing one of the perpetual pensions which Mr. Bradlaugh wishes to hav abolished.

I presume you saw a report of the action for libel, brought by the Rev. Brewin Grant against the proprietor of a provincial newspaper for passing strictures on a discussion in which he took a share. The parson is a very meek and modest man. He stated in court that he "knew more about the Christian religion than any other man living," and that he had engaged in public discussion with every Infidel of note in this country, in every case completely defeating them. It may be that he has greater knowledge of the subject than any one else, for he never makes use of it, but carefully stores it up, thinking, no doubt, that if he imparts it to others, he will lose it himself. He invariably uses the customary Christian and most telling argument, viz., abuse; and on this particular occasion the editor of the paper said in his report that he did not think this course was very convincing.

I see by a daily paper that the missionaries hav been busy again in the South Sea Islands. Two nativs, trained to "the good work" by the American Mission Society, were sent to Tapituca with instructions to convert the unbelievers there as speedily as possible. They at once commenced operations in a very business-like manner. They instituted capital punishment, and decreed Sabbath-breaking a penal offense. After persuading the inhabitants to giv up all arms in their possession, they proceeded to equip their converts with bowie-knives, and instructed them to fall upon their pagan brethren on a certain night and extirpate them. The Christian Tapitucans executed their orders to the letter and made a slaughter of 314 men, women, and children. This is a very simple plan for extirpating heresy and Infidelity, and if it had not already been tried in past times in Europe and America, might be commended to the consideration of the various societies for propagating the gospel.

During the past week the newspapers hav been very busy respecting the late Earl of Beaconsfield. They, most of them, bearing in mind the old adage, "Speak nothing but good of the dead," hav forgotten to be honest, and those which abused him roundly while living hav now discovered that the country has lost a most inestimable treasure. One of the Tory organs says that not only England but Europe has sustained a most irreparable loss. This is doubtless true, though perhaps not in the way the writer intends it. There are some losses which are positiv gains, as no doubt you hav thought when you hav lost a severe cold, for instance. That the deceased was a remarkable man may be readily admitted; but that his was an example worthy of being followed, is open to question. He has been well described as an unprincipled adventurer. His only object in life was self-aggrandizment, and he let nothing stand in the way of his ambition. He was eminently successful in throwing dust in the eyes of the members of his party, and the more he snubbed them the meeker they became, and, eventually, he was looked up to as a god by the brainless portion of the community, and now that their idol is broken, they are in sore distress. The country would hav been some millions of money better off had he died ten years ago. During his career he did all the mischief he possibly could, and it was certainly not his fault he did not do more. At the same time it cannot be denied he did some good things during his political career, not, however, because they were good or beneficial to others, but that they answered his purpose.

That professional philanthropist, the Earl of Shaftesbury, addressed a meeting at the east end of London the other day, and congratulated his hearers upon the triumph the Lord had had in securing a majority against the measure brought forward last year in favor of opening the museums and picture galleries on Sunday; but as it gets smaller every year, he fears, unless strenuous efforts are made, the ungodly will triumph when it is again introduced, so he urged all workingmen to get up memorials and protest against what he terms "the proposed desecration of the Sabbath," and to pray as hard as ever they can "for God's blessing on their efforts." What a peculiar opinion this poor man must hav of his deity! He seems to fancy that he possesses very little power, and that they must all hang together to resist the enemy. I suppose, as he goes in for preaching himself, and rather likes it, he has a fellow feeling for the members of the craft, and would be very sorry to see so large and wealthy a trades union broken up. But his feeble efforts will only somewhat retard, but cannot stop, the wave of progress, urged on by the spread of education that is sweeping, slowly but surely, over the west of Europe and the United States.

Believe me, fraternally yours, J. D.

Monopolies.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A friend of mine has called my attention to an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29th, headed "Corporations, Consolidations, and Monopolies," and I would like to say a few words in response thereto.

No one can reasonably deny that humanity is better conditioned with these monopolies than it could hav been without them, but there remains a necessity for conditions far superior to any that can exist in their presence.

Polygamy was the first possibility of human society; yet such a monopoly cannot be tolerated with safety under a republican government. This monopoly was inaugurated by brute force and military prowess. These marriage monopolies were monarchical or one-headed despotisms.

The national monarchy is a larger monopoly, and it can be sustained only by military force.

In its proper place monarchicalism was a blessing to the race, and the race could not hav accomplished its present attainments without it, but when its uses were fulfilled, its continuance became a curse.

The Bible allegories teach that these monopolies constituted the antediluvian world, and that they were destroyed by an uprising of the people that was like unto a flood of the waters. The cause of this flood consisted in the fact that the sons of the gods took to wife of the daughters of men all that they chose. Thus the earth was filled with violence, the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep were broken up. In this allegory, the heavens represented the ruling class and the earth represented the subjected class. The rulers were gods, the ruled were men, and the sons of the gods (Elohim) were the sons of rulers. Their polygamic practices filled the earth with a violence that led to the uprising of the people and the downfall of the monarchical system of society. The foundation of a new system of society was accomplished by the substitution of monogamic for polygamic marriage.

Monogamy is a system of monopoly that enables man as a class to monopolize woman as a class.

Class monopoly is a political or many-headed despotism, and on it all national politicisms hav been built.

These political monopolies cannot long exist in the presence of polygamy, nor can they be long maintained by military force alone, and therefore it was supplemented by diplomatic arrangements called the money system.

In the true sense of the word, money is the product of the mine, measured by coinage. The money system consists mainly in the monopoly of coinage, the legal tendering of money (coin), a legal rate of interest thereon, and the substitution of I. O. U. therefor. Thus an evidence of debt is made to draw interest, and some people hav been so deceived by this diplomatic trick that they are ready to swear that a legalized promis to pay is the only genuin money.

This money system can exist only in a political despotism, the basis of which is the monopoly of woman as a class by man as a class; and be it known to you, Mr. Editor, and to all truth seekers, that the monopolies of which you complain can exist only in the presence and by the virtue of this monogamic monopoly. Abolish this monopoly, and organize men, women, and children for productiv and commercial industries, and you will render the money system useless and powerless. The money system has served to capitalize debt and credit, and such an organization would soon capitalize labor and skill.

All national politicisms are controled by a money-ocracy. The money system is now supplemented by a banking system that enables the money-ocracy to control the machinery of the government. Our president was elected through the instrumentality of the banks.

When men, women, and children are organized for industrial purposes without any class distinctions monopolies of every sort will be rendered impossible.

A complete plan for such an organization has been developed and tested ready for use when the day of reconstruction cometh. S. T. FOWLER.

descendants would doubtless have starved to death. The state of Illinois has more than six times as much fertile land as all of Palestine, and can produce ten times as much corn, wheat and cattle. If God wished to select a fine country for his chosen people, why did he not take such a country as Ohio, Illinois, or Iowa? Possibly he did not know anything about them. I presume I will know something of the godly land of Palestine, within a few months, from personal observation, when I will be able to tell you whether it flows more profusely with milk and honey than other countries. Probably I may report what I see of that holy land.

I notice how easily you establish to your own satisfaction the problem of the origin of matter. It is almost equal to the way in which you prove there is a God—because the Bible says so. This question of the origin of worlds, or the origin of matter, is very extensive and very remote. The Bible throws no light upon it whatever. Those who wrote the Bible knew far less than those on the earth to-day. They did not know how matter come and very little of its qualities. You seem half disposed to admit that it was not absolutely made from nothing, but simply put in motion, or that the ability to change was imparted to it. If it had any kind of previous existence in all probability it had laws controling it, and there was nothing for Yahweh to do towards setting it in motion. Unfortunately Prof. Winchell can tell but little more about it than other people. His "primordial condition" means but little; primordial in geology simply pertains to the lowest beds of the Silurian period, corresponding to the Potsdam period in our American geology. The term, and all that Prof. Winchell says, explain not how matter was brought into existence. You are also wrong when you say that "chemical analysis brings us to a period and shows a condition behind which there was no change nor action." I deny it in toto. Chemistry proves nothing of the kind. From that and other sciences we may infer that matter has ever been active, nor is there any reason to think there was ever a time when it did not act and was not susceptible to universal, inherent law. If the nebular theory is true, that earth and the whole solar system evolved from fire mist, it by no means follows that matter had an origin. Worlds and systems may have passed through the evolutionary stages from nebulous matter to defunct and decomposed bodies for millions of times so far as we know to the contrary.

With all the light and reason we can bring to bear upon the subject, in my estimation, it is far more reasonable to conclude that matter always existed in some form than that it was ever produced from nothing by any imaginary god or devil. And it seems just as easy to conceive of the eternality of the universe as of a being able to create it from non-existence. The universe exists. We see it, we feel it; we know it and that it can be neither increased nor diminished; but there is not the first iota of proof that any god has an existence, save what men have said of him who knew no more about him than we do. The theological idea that a god must be imagined to account for the existence of the universe is without the slightest reason. If the universe, because of its intricacy, extent, and perfection, necessitates a maker or creator, how much more must a maker or creator capable of producing such a universe necessitate another maker or creator of him. This reminds me of the remark of a little girl who when being told of the theological idea of God creating the earth, sun, moon, and stars, said, " would like to have three questions answered: Who made God? Who made him? and, Where did they come from?" The question, "Who made God?" has very naturally been asked by thousands. If they must believe the universe had a creator because of its wonderful character and qualities, they can scarcely escape the suggestion, "Then this creator must hav had a maker also, and who was he? If the existence of the universe proves a creator, then the existence of this god proves that he must have had a creator; and where is the end of creators?" It by no means settles the difficult problem of existence to say "God made it all;" for nobody having seen God, nobody knowing anything of him, he is a far greater sphinx, a far greater mystery, than the universe, which can be viewed, investigated, and studied. To me it is far more reasonable to take the universe with all its matter, all its forces, all its laws, as the totality and the eternality of all existence, all entity, than the foolish imaginings of a crude, ignorant, babarous tribe of men, of a crude, personal, anthropomorphic, fickle, revengeful, angry, merciless God, bringing it all from nonentity less than six thousand years ago. As to the origin of God, we are always told by theologians that we must not think upon this subject; we must accept the theory that God always existed. But I believe the truth to be that the universe always existed, that human beings are a product and a part of the universe, and that they have made all the gods that the world has known anything about.

Instead, then, of cudgeling our brains as to who made God and how he made the universe, let us accept the great truth tha the universe never was made, that matter never was made, any more than space was made, but has the quality of eternal existence. A single atom of it cannot be made, and cannot be unmade by millions of gods, devils, and men combined.

I must leave unsaid till another time much that I wished to say. Yours truly, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 11, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find post-office order for $5, according to promis, for your trip and ours. We hope the gods may go with you.

From your friend, WM. FRAY.

MUSKEGON, MICH., May 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $5 for your China trip. I trust you will do as you please about going. Should you not go, giv the $5 to Mrs. Bennett. Yours, etc., JOSHUA DAVIES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I inclose a ten-dollar bill, against your pericosmic tour, on account of John Cosgrove and myself.

In wishing you a fair and successful circumterraneous voyage, my solicitude for your welfare prompts me to say, Look out for the Jesuits; they were always unscrupulous to a degree utterly beyond ordinary conception, and now their position is fast becoming desperate. JAMES C. LEHMER.

CROSSWICKS, N. J., May 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: By the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we learn thee has decided to circumnavigate the globe. We hope thee may go and return in safety and with renewed health. It is a long, toilsome voyage. There are some parts of it I most sincerely hope thee will enjoy. I anticipate reading thy weekly letters with great pleasure.

Inclosed thee will find a twenty-dollar note, the amount I pledged. I hope there will be a prompt responding of all who hav agreed to the proposition and sent in their names.

Very respectfully and sincerely thy friend,

CAROLINE S. ELLIS.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. J., May 10, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed I send draft for $5, the amount subscribed by me for your journey round the world. Yours respectfully G. LEVOR.

RENOVO, PA., May 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $5 for that long trip.

Yours truly, GEO. W. HUBER.

FOXBURG, PA., May 9, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find draft for my $5 for your trip. With best wishes to you and Mrs. Bennett, Yours, G. C. FINK.

VINELAND, N. J., May 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find money order for a "V" for the trip round the world. Hope you will receive a thousand or more before you start,

Yours truly, A. BENNETT HOUGH.

BENNINGTON, N. H., May 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5, according to promis, for the [illegible]y. I hope the friends will all be prompt and not keep you anxiously waiting. God bless you, and good luck and good health be with you. Yours truly, GEORGE GEER.

LOCUST VALLEY, L. I., May 12, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Please accept my mite and go on your way rejoicing. JOHN G. RODMAN.

ANGELICA, N. Y., May 10, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find draft for $5 for your proposed trip round the world as per agreement.

Yours, etc, J. T. BROWN.

AUBURN, N. Y., May 9, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You may put me down for $5 for your trip round the world. Go by all means, and call on me whenever you want it.

Yours truly, EDWIN GREENFIELD.

NEW HAVEN, CT., May 11, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Find inclosed the promised $5 for your contemplated tour round the world. With your hosts of other friends I shall await with no small degree of interest and pleasure the glowing and truthful accounts of the same, such as only an Infidel can, or rather will, giv.

Hoping you will hav a prosperous journey and a safe return, I remain yours most cordially,

L. F. JOHNSON.

AYER, MASS., May 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Now that you hav decided to make the circuit of our little globe, I am inclined to take some stock in the enterprise, wishing to secure the "two or three volumes" you so generously offer.

We hav "Around the World" by various authors and as many points of view, and we anticipate with pleasure one seen through Infidel (questioning) eyes—one whose eyes are not dimmed by the scales of tradition. Reputed Infidels hav often been "the light of the world." Giv us all the light you can. If you see men and trees walking, or the reverse, we confidently expect facts. Yours truly,

ELIJAH MYRICK.

HANOVER JUNCTION, VA., May 7, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find check for the promised $5, which amount is to be used in your contemplated tour round the world. I sincerely hope you may receive sufficient funds to enable you to start at once. With best wishes for your success,

I am very respectfully yours,

JAMES B. DENTON.

EAST HADDAM, CONN., May 8, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: You will find inclosed a check for ten dollars, the amount of my subscription toward your circular excursion. You hav my best wishes with this small donation, and if I hear of you in trouble I may do more for you.

I was in hopes you would postpone your trip till 1882, and then make up a party to accompany you. However, success to you. Very truly yours,

F. L. RAY.

ADRIAN, MICH., May 9, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: So it seems you hav settled on a trip round the globe. In my humble opinion this is all in wisdom, though some of our friends think otherwise. And truly it would be a sad affair if you should be lost in a shipwreck, or if you should die by the way; but accidents and death often overtake us at home.

Then as regards THE TRUTH SEEKER, I think we need not fear after the test we hav had from its managers while the Christians had its editor-in-chief in their bastile, and also while he was absent in Europe. Indeed, I look forward toward its present subscription list being doubled after you get fairly on your route. I most certainly will do my part toward that end. Then in reference to Mrs. Bennett going with you on this round-the-world trip, I am in judgment entirely with you in this matter; taking all the circumstances into account, I think it would be a very unwise course. But after you come home, and you are chuck full of knowledge of the oriental lands, and you make the round-the-U. S. trip, to deal out this knowledge to the Liberal public and sell your books to those who may want them and who hav not paid their $5, then will be the time for Mrs. Bennett to go with you as financier and hav a good visit with the many American friends she will find over the country.

When I last dropped you a private card from Ann Arbor, I was then under the doctor's care. My health is still quite poor. Having now all my domestic matters in a shape so that I can be spared from home about as well as not, I hav concluded to spend a portion of the summer at least in my nativ state, Pennsylvania, and to attend our progressiv friends' yearly meeting at Longwood, Chester county, where I should be most happy to meet you when the hot weather comes on. I want to spend a few days at the sea-shore, and mean to. I suppose your friends will giv you a parting farewell meeting, and I must be there, and if there is a chance for me to fire off a few words I will most surely be doing so. I shall want to take you by the hand and look you in the face, and, as the Quakers said to Henry Clay at Richmond, Ind., after he made his great antislavery political electioneering speech, "God be with thee, Henry, and we will." So I want to say to you, Good speed be with thee, friend Bennett, and we will look after the interests of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the cause it defends in your absence. So might it be,

S. D. MOORE.

STANTON, IOWA, May 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a postal order for $5, which I pledged myself to giv toward your trip round the world, with my best wishes for the trip. And if you should not go you can send some of your other works for the same; that is, if you do not get funds enough. Yours truly, O. E. ERICKSON.

SALEM STATION, WIS., April 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER came to hand last night, and by it I learned that you hav decided to circumnavigate this globe. I hav had some misgivings about your being able to withstand the wear and tear of such a trip; but you must be the judge, and I will hope for the best results.

Inclosed you will find my share of the needful to send you on your journey. Accept my kind regards, while I hope for your safe return to your family and friends. A. D. CORNWELL.

P. S.—For fear that some will fail to come to time with the needful, I double my pledge, and you may send the books to my daughter, Mrs. Flora Turner, of Bristol, Wisconsin. A. D. C.

EXCELSIOR, MINN., May 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $1 to pay the first four months of my subscription. I could hav remitted a little sooner, but a number of enthusiastic correspondents conjured up by my first letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, promised, without solicitation on my part, to pay my subscription (in view of my youth and poverty I suppose), but my tab still tells me it is unpaid, and so if I pay it myself I will know it is paid. So if you are satisfied with my way of paying you need not "stop my paper."

I want to thank you for writing those last two letters (the tenth and eleventh) to Mr. Mair. They are grand. I consider Mr. Mair's answer to your tenth letter a rather weak solution of the Lord knows what. Perhaps it is the best his system will admit of.

I would like to ask Dr. Hardcastle what bearing his blood-lettering has upon a future life, when the alleged occurrence took place long before his sister departed this life.

Father Bennett, I don't like for you go round the world. I do not believe THE TRUTH SEEKER will suffer, but I know I shall. My father is a tor, and he tells me there is danger to one of your age in making such a trip, especially if he is more intent upon work than upon taking care of himself. However, I expect you will go, and if you do you must remember that you will always hav one little girl thinking of you who would pray for you only that she knows it would do you no good. BIRDIE SHUCK.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., May 5, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: An "Around the World" companion, in your now determined tour, would be a great acquisition to yourself, and, for your friends, a very great satisfaction to know that you were not entirely alone and dependent upon strangers, speaking a different language and unacquainted with your worth, in case of illness or accident; as well as to hav some one near to participate in your joys and advantages.

If I had the advantage of no greater accumulation of years than yourself it would be a source of great pleasure as well as profit to me to accompany you. Knowing so well your great kindness of heart, your intelligence, kindred enthusiasm in the pursuit of knowledge, and love of the good and beautiful in nature; and withal extensiv reading and entire unselfishness as a prominent and happy trait in your character, together with your high moral purposes in life, I would feel such a tour, with such a companion, to be a most happy combination of fortuitous circumstances to enjoy and profit by such extensiv observations of "around the world" of wonders, associated with the past and present, with which your mind is largely engaged.

Is there no man of even moderate means ready and eager to avail himself of these rare privileges? Or some father anxious to secure so extensiv a tour and instructiv a companion for a son?

Let such want of a companion and favorable opportunity for the same be known as the desire of Your warm friend, CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

WINTHROP, IOWA, May 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find money order for $6—one to repair Paine's monument and five for your trip round or over our globe, or to stay at home and edit THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you ever make a success of raising the wherewithal to go you must adopt a better system than taking promises for cash down, or you will hav to wait until this mortal shall put on immortality or until you evolve into a winged something that can fly away without money or price and get a view of not only this earth but all the heavenly host besides. Then what of the promis of a $5 book to record what you saw and heard on such a journey? Again, if Comstock should be there first he might prevent you from using the post-office for the delivery of the book, and then who could think of what might befall us who would be waiting for its delivery! Respectfully, ALEXANDER RISK.

GALT, ONT., May 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Here is my $5 for the round trip; and this is what it is given for, to enable D. M. Bennett to travel round the world and tell what he sees and hears in a series of letters; to giv him a roving commission to go where he pleases and when he pleases; to publish these letters in book form and giv me a copy; to relieve him at once of Comstockism and all its concomitant filth, the Young Men's Christian Association, and all its love. I hav no wish to keep him in the front of the battle till he dies, nor see him get another thirteen months in prison for Jesus's sake. I would wish this to be the crowning work of his life. It should be illustrated and yield an ample provision for the evening shadows in the dark valley. Are all your friends in dead earnest, and will they forward their money at once? It would be worse than folly to start till you hav the money in hand to see you through.

I hope our friends won't worry about Mrs. Bennett, who will no doubt prefer to hav you visiting the remains of the Druids at Stonehenge, Fingall's cave, or even kiss the blarney stone, than to hav you stay at home and fight the diabolical fiends of Jesus.

I hav read "Comstock's Career of Cruelty and Crime," and must admit that the love of Jesus passeth understanding.

I hav another subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER in embryo. And now may you, too, find a genius in tombs and ruins who shall direct your steps, preside over your meditations, and giv you a safe return to home and friends. Your friend, WM. E. RENWICK.

WILKESBARRE, PA., Jan. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The idea suggested by Mr. Coleman to hav you make a trip around the world is a good one, and one to which I shall feel happy to subscribe $5, as I know the volume will be worth double its cost; but I would suggest, as it is intended as a historical reference, that a committee of some authoritativ character issue a commission to you, say from the "Liberal League of America." This would go a great way in introducing you to the oriental societies, and to scholars who in order to set themselvs before the western continent in a proper light would be induced to lend such aid as their judgment suggested in furtherance of the objects of this investigation. I fear that otherwise many of the most interesting places and information would be inaccessible to a mere traveler. You should visit the stone temple at Madura especially, in which is found the chisled body of Chrishna upon the cross, and be permitted to get a view of all the documentary evidence of his history. I was sorry that in your visit to England you failed to see and describe "Moore's Pantheon," containing information of this character.

In order to hav your full time, and enjoy life as it should be, I would also say by all means take Mrs. Bennett with you. Never since your first acquaintance would your conversation be so interesting to each other as such an otherwise lonely trip in a far-away land, and of strange languages, would make them. This would make it necessary to hav mapped out beforehand same definit plan with regard to what information is most needed, and the best manner of getting it. By all means make the effort to bestow upon mankind this work of an "Infidel Around the World." Yours, J. R.

NEW HARTFORD, IOWA, May 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a constant reader of your paper for three years, and I like your honesty and style of writing, especially the way you are dishing it up to Mr. Mair. My father was a Quaker, and I think I must hav been born an Infidel, as I hav never believed in bibles, gods, devils, angels, hell, or any of those mythical worthies. If you make the tour around the world, you can call on me for $5 any time you want it. R. D. TRICKLAND.

WEST WINFIELD, N. Y., M 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Then you are going! May health, safety, happiness, and all good be with you. I hav fallen into line at the eleventh hour, and now inclose $5 of the needful. I trust you will return to us with a new lease of life to battle yet for years against the bigotry, creeds, and ignorance of the present and past. Yours for justice and truth,

MRS. SCOTT BRIGGS.

AUBURN, N. Y., May 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your postal and "Infidel Abroad" came duly at hand, fully meeting with my expectations. The last TRUTH SEEKER has also made its welcome appearance again. Your discussion is progressing with continued earnestness, thoroughly exhausting the important subject. Several of your last letters are just mammoth. I want the book as soon as finished. I see you are going to make the trip round the world. Good, I will remit you in a few days sure. L. DE WITT GRISWOLD.

QUINCY, ILL., May 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As you hav decided to take the trip round the world, you will please find inclosed $5 as per agreement to assist you on your most prolonged and wearisome journey, as I think it would be. But while it will be a long journey for you to undertake, I hope it will prove a success to you financially. So far as the book is concerned, there is not a doubt in anyone's mind of its success. It will be a grand history, to be sure, and from a different standpoint from any heretofore given to the public.

I send best wishes to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope for a safe and pleasant journey and a speedy return to your editorial duties, as I think that THE TRUTH SEEKER needs your masterly brain to control it, although under the supervision of Mr. Macdonald it will come to its readers loaded down with knowledge each week worth twice the subscription price. Let us hear each week from the old veteran D. M. Bennett without fail. How the readers will hasten to the post-office on the night of each week that the paper arrives, and tear from it its wrapper, and quickly open and look for a letter from its most worthy editor! But no more. Yours for the truth and success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, FRANK R. SHERWOOD.

CORDOVA, ILL., May 10, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for $5, my installment for that long journey round the globe. Our best wishes for your safe return. I hope all who hav agreed to pay toward that trip will do so promptly, and not keep you waiting for the means to commence it within ten days, if you desire. Yours truly, J. HOKE.

VERSAILLES, IND., May 10, 1 1.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see you hav now determined to take the trip round the world. I am very glad of it indeed. I admire your writings very much, for your style is so clear, earnest, and plain. You enter into the minutiæ of everything you discuss. You are to me the most entertaining writer I ever read, especially in your descriptions of soil, climate, and the habits, customs, manners of peoples, their superstitions and oppressions. I hope you will be able to remain in Syria and Palestine at least long enough to giv us every item of your observation. I w) know about the pillar of salt, and wh[illegible]gen was in Palestine or Ethiopia. Perhaps you can find the very cave in which Lot and his two daughters resided, or at least the residence of the dirty hermit who wrote the stuff.

I inclose my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER up to January 7, 1882, and now here agree to purchase a set of your books as soon as published, in which your trip will be fully set out.

We will keep the ball rolling and divide ourselvs here into a committee of one, each to procure additional readers and subscribers to our beloved TRUTH SEEKER. Liberals are not organized here. We hav each to do what we can in our own way, hoping for lecturers and organization.

I would like to write very much, but your time, space, and patience, I fear, forbid. I am not flush with money, else I would like to send you some to help you on your journey. Yours in the cause,

ADAM STOCKINGER.

"VOTE EARLY AND OFTEN."

DENVER, IOWA, May 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The above is the injunction of the unprincipled politician to his party-bound dupes. But seeing that some others hav voted twice, I do want to vote once more, and then I am done.

More than seven years ago, comparativly unknown, you sent THE TRUTH SEEKER afloat. You hav by untiring industry and attention to business worked yourself up to a position which has secured for you the bitter enmity of more than one publisher, who, in common with thousands of others who hate Liberalism would greatly rejoice to see you and your paper crushed. A few at least of the professed Liberals—wolves in sheep's clothing—are among the number. We hav not forgotten the acts of the seceders when you, the John Brown of Liberalism (every reform has its John Brown), was innocently confined in a felon's cell by those who use the law to promote their religion and to destroy those they count as enemies.

But the true Liberals of the nation, remembering those in bonds as bound with them as far as in their power, came to your assistance and rallied around THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Liberal League. Yes, you gave to Liberalism the greatest impetus it has ever known in this country. And nothing but your death could better please your envious and bigoted enemies than to get you out of this country. Shall your friends unthinkingly secure the end sought by the church? Why, if these should hold their peace the very clergy would cry out, Go. Voluntarily leave THE TRUTH SEEKER in charge of another! No other can be D. M. Bennett, and should you leave it for a year or two I greatly fear should you ever return and find THE TRUTH SEEKER in existence you will find more or less dissatisfaction, with a subscription list diminished instead of increased. Do you hear the thunder of the coming storm? Let every true and stanch Liberal now stand at his post ready. We want not one to leave. We want more and not less of such men as D. M. Bennett.

Where is the Physiologist? Where will the godly Republican-Comstock blow fall next? Will THE TRUTH SEEKER or Investigator be next assailed? No sympathy or aid will come from Grand Pacific parlors. Your absence will embolden tyrants and discourage Liberals. Your presence will encourage Liberals and intimidate tyrants and their tools. Stay till the storm be passed and the right to publish be established here, or your book "Round the World" may never be published. If, however, you go, and your travels are published during my life, I expect to hav it. But the right to publish and mail must come before the book. Don't desert your gun, nor allow it to be spiked. For the right, ever yours.

M. FARRINGTON.

[We think we can assure our good brother that the battle for the right will be as vigorously maintained in these columns when we are absent as when at home. And so far from THE TRUTH SEEKER falling off because of our absence, we believe that very absence will nerve many a strong arm to make extra efforts to increase its circulation and efficacy.—ED. T. S.]

KIRKSVILLE, MO., May 9, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: According to promis, I remit by draft five dollars. I think you should not be too hasty in completing the trip unless lack of means requires it. Traveling is tiresome, mental labor hard, and you will need rest now and then; besides, you should take time to gather all the information you can as far as means will permit, for such a trip cannot be made every day. What a nice thing it would be if you could hav an artist with you to take stereoscopic views! The only fears I hav of your safety is overwork. Respectfully, WM. HART.

FERGUS, ONT., CAN., April 29, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I cannot think of trying to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Through its influence I hav been converted. I was a Campbellite preacher, but THE TRUTH SEEKER opened my eyes to enable me to see the truth as it is in nature and reason. I feel anxious that others should come to the light of truth as I hav done. I would be glad if all my brethren in the Campbellite ranks would read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would that they would reason upon the subject and giv up a belief in a mythical God and Christ. I am certain the world would be better without such belief.

Cheerfully yours, S. E. HAIGHT.

Bathsheba's Bath.

BY ALHAZA.

She trembled like the perfumed flower
That bathes in April's gentlest storm;
O maddened drops, what shame to hide
The beauty of that shrinking form!

Say, was it sin? Jehovah leaned
In rapture from a darksome cloud:
"She is more beautiful than Eve,
With rosy wreath and leafy shroud."

There came one thrill from David's harp,
But nevermore its song was shed;
He heard the wind-swept lily's chime,
He breathed the scent of violet bed,

And saw the grace of drifted snow,
The melting lines of beauty's pride,
And blamed the wealth of raven hair
That strove her shuddering form to hide.

Madly he cast his crown away:
What is a king upon his throne?
A lion in a gloomy lair,
A panting statue all alone,

Without one glimmer of the ray
That lights that brow so heavenly pale,
Or tremor of the bosom white,
That I might read the blissful tale

That all my love was not despair,
That all my madness was not crime—
A shadow on a mournful sea,
An echo of a funeral chime!

I cannot bear the desert's breath,
With such delicious coolness near,
Nor linger in the courts of death,
While the sweet hues of life are here.

Is there a thought, a breath of wrong,
To strike my heart with sudden chill?
Bring me a vase of luscious wine—
Wild, throbbing bosom, peace, be still!

Pertinent Queries.

How old is God? Has he gray hair?
Can he see yet? Where did he hav to stay
Before, you know, he had made anywhere?
Who does he pray to when he has to pray?
—Little Girl.

If there was nothing once but God,
What did he do? Where did he do it?
Who made him, and when was he made?
I guess he growed before he knew it.
—Big Girl.

Now let us old folks ask ourselvs
What hav we been believing
All the long years through which we've passed,
Are Christian dogmas all deceiving?
Is there a God on a white throne
Who made and rules this universe?
Calls men his children? A few he loves,
But many he delights to curse.
Is it a glorious, sweet thought
That when I've done with earthly care
I'll sit before the great white throne
Though not a friend of mine is there?
But down in a deep, fiery pit
The loved of earth I hear and see
Writhing and tossing in their pain,
And know it is endless agony.
Are saints in heaven made of ice?
Or are they statues carved in stone,
To look on such revolting scenes
And meekly say, "Thy will be done?"

In Memoriam.

[To Jesse W. Townsend, who died June 23, 1880.]

BY CORNELIA GARDNER.

Bear him to rest! 'Tis time the weary brow
Was bathed in holier waters. He is now
Resting from life's fierce struggle, and his eye,
No longer dim, sees all that passes by.
Make his bed lowly; 'mid the flowrets lay
His weary form. The closing day
Shall bear no twilight ray to him;
His vision shall behold the broadening rim
Of light that marks the open day. Quite near
Are all the loved ones, and they all appear
As often seen before with mental vision
As he has tried to pierce the veil elysian.
Oh, bear him without tears and without fear;
For that which seems so saddening shall appear
To him all glorious as he wakes in light
Immortal, ne'er to rest in shades of night.
Waiting no longer for release, he waits for thee,
O patient heart and weary, by the crystal sea;
He lingers for your bark borne to the other shore
Where parting ne'er shall come, and nevermore
The eyes be dimmed with tears, or aching brow
Ask for cool waters to relieve, as now.
Does the lone path seem tedious? Waiting long
Will end at last in one triumphant song.

—Williams.

I light my Havana
And step into my car,
And ride, ride, ride.
Then in brown, shady nook,
Near an unseen, whispering brook,
And a half-seen lake, mit book,
I hide, hide, hide;
And say, Great world, roll on,
To a lovelier world I'm gone,
To a rose without a thorn
Up there, there, there.
For never sun shone on,
In all his journey done
Since first his race begun,
A fairy scene more fair.

RELIGION

AS REVEALED BY THE

Material and Spiritual Universe.

(ILLUSTRATED.)

By Edwin D. Babbitt.

It treats of the Existence and General Character of God, God as a Spirit, the Nature of God, Creeds and Practices of Christianity, The Dangers of Infallible Standards, The Christian Bible Tested, Religions Tested by their Fruits, Life and Death Under the Old Religions, Life and Death Under a Spiritual Religion, The Future Religion.

The book is a scientific, philosophical treatis upon the above and other subjects, by a thorough scholar. He is widely known by his "Principles of Light and Color," "Health Manual," etc., and this new book is sure to be read with even greater interest than those.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusively that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

The author's conception of fnture life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourtcen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many gratefnl expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Important to Invalids. The Most Marvelous Invention in the World

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.
Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introdnction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.
The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose te stimony is given below. This poor man will tell you th at fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest re li f. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, an d while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the pr ivileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his n me; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without cr utches; and even then the wicked character of the man w as evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a ttle, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pauder to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

It is a strange trade, I hav often thought, that of advocacy. Your intellect, your highest heavenly gift, hung up in the shop window like a loaded pistol for sale, will either blow out a pestilent scoundrel's brains, or the scoundrel's salutary sheriff's officer's (in a sense), as you please to choose for your guinea.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

Keep not standing, fixed and rooted;
Briskly venture, briskly roam;
Head and hand, where'er thou foot it.
And stout heart, are still at home.
In each land the sun does visit,
We are gay whate'er betide;
To giv space for wandering was it
That the world was made so wide.
—Goethe.

We should protest against our children being compelled to waste their precious time in our public schools in reading and listening to such a mass of balderdash, very little of which is comprehended or understood by either teacher or pupil, and if it were, much of which would be worse than unprofitable. We protest against taking such a book, written no one knows when or by whom, no one knows where or by how many, as our unfailing guide and rule of action through life.—Elmina D. Slenker.

All doctrins relating to the creation of the world, the government of man by superior beings, and his destiny after death, are conjectures which hav been given out as facts, handed down, with many adornments, by tradition and accepted by posterity as "revealed religion." They are theories more or less rational, which uncivilized men believe that they believe. These doctrins are not in themselvs of any moral value. It is of no consequence, morally speaking, whether a man believes that the world has been made by one god or by twenty gods.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

The idea of gospel inspiration is received, not from any proof that it is so, but from an opinion or feeling that it ought to be so. The doctrin arose, not because it was provable, but because it was wanted. Divines can produce no stronger reason for believing in the inspiration of the gospel narrativs than their own opinion that it is not likely God should hav left so important a series of facts to the ordinary chances of history. But, on a little reflection, it will be obvious that we hav no ground whatever for presuming that God will act in this or in that manner under any given circumstances, beyond what previous analogies may furnish; and in this case no analogy exists.—W. R. Greg.

Activ and sympathetic conduct with man in the transactions of daily life is a better preparation for healthy, robust action than any amount of meditation and seclusion. What Swedenborg said about vowing poverty and retiring from the world in order to liv more to heaven seems reasonable and true. "The life that leads to heaven," he said, "is not a life of retirement from the world but of action in the world." A life of charity, which consists in acting sincerely and justly in every enjoyment and work, in obedience to the divine law, is not difficult, but a life of piety alone is difficult, and it leads away from heaven as much as it is commonly believed to lead to it.—Smiles's Duty.

Certainly when the things are in themselvs totally indifferent, the principle of concession to the superstitions of minds governed by traditional belief—recommended by Paul or whoever is the author of the epistle to the Romans—may sometimes be advantageously adopted. But the importance of protesting against the bondage exercised by such beliefs over human life is also not to be underrated, and Paul (?) seems scarcely to giv it sufficient weight in the argument. (Romans xiv and xv.) No doubt, on the ground of policy, and in reference to the desirability of keeping the members of the nascent sect from internal quarrels, Paul was right; but a principle which, in certain cases, may he expedient for a given end, is not to be set up as a universal rule of ethics. . . If pushed too far it must end in the perpetual subordination of the whole body to the weakness of its least enlightened members.—Amberley.

Nature has no godlike emotions in play, or noble exhibitions of power. By dint of ceaseless, untiring exertions and an endless crawling of magnetic influences, she wends her way from one stage of life to another. If luxury chokes up one avenue necessary to health she quietly opens another, wilts and destroys organs or increases their number, and packs them together with matchless patience and dexterity. If the stomach cannot disgorge its rich contents, a liver can easily be made to exist to preside over a more refined department of labor. If the liver fails, heaven only knows what is in store for luxurious man. There is nothing godlike except an organization which has progressed far enough to exhibit the workings of high moral attributes. The philosophic mind discerns nothing noble or lofty in a medley of adaptivness and slavish submission to conditions seemingly imposed by fate.—Alhaza.

In the Christian sects and churches of to-day "eternal life" is reserved for those, and for those only, who accept or profess a string of metaphysical propositions conceived in a scholastic brain and put into scholastic phraseology; and to crown the whole, a hell is conceived so horrible as to make heaven an impossibility; for what must be the temper of the Elect Few who could taste an hour's felicity while the innumerable myriads of their dearest fellow-beings—their husbands and wives, their mothers, their children—were writhing in eternal torments within sight and hearing of their paradise? Theologians transmogrify the pure precepts and devotion of Jesus into a religion as nearly as possible their opposit, and then decree that whoever will not adopt their travesty "without doubt shall perish everlastingly." It is the old spectacle which so disturbed Jeremiah reproduced in our days: "A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely and the priests bear rule through their means; and the people love to hav it so; and what will be the end thereof?"—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Odds and Ends.

The song of the billiard ball: "Oh! carrom me back."

The pantry cook sings, "Good pie, sweet tart, good pie."

The play of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is all on account of Eliza. Stowe this away.

"A splendid ear, but a poor voice," as the organ grinder said of the donkey.

How shall we reach the boys?—Mrs. Livermore. Take a little longer shingle.

Miss Braddon's latest work should be dedicated to Eli Perkins. Its title is, "Just as I Am; or, a Living Lie."

Theodore More had married eight different women. So whenever he joined a party of villagers in a frolic they welcomed him with "The More, the marrier."

Letter from his well beloved to a young gummy: "Finally, my ownest own, understand that I love you more for your defects than your moral qualities, and thus judge of the boundlessness of my love for you!"

SOME LEADING QUESTIONS.

A young man, who looked as though he had a heap of things on his mind, but who struggled hard to appear outwardly calm, put a $5 bill on the desk of a Detroit lawyer, the other day and said:

"I want to ask you a few leading questions."

"Go ahead," was the reply, as the money was quickly thrust out of sight.

"If I am engaged to a girl and I go back on her what can she do?"

"Sue you for breach of promis."

"But if she goes back on me what can I do?"

"Hunt up another."

"Um! Suppose I hav presented her with a $1 fan, a pair of bracelets, a parasol, and a ring?"

"Then she's so much ahead."

"If I believe that her infatuation for another is but a passing whim and I flourish a revolver and talk suicide, what then?"

"Her father will probably pick you up and drop you in the first mud puddle."

"Um! Suppose I had presented her mother with a twenty-shilling umbrella?"

"Then she'll keep dry."

"Suppose, sir, I had for the purpose of making myself solid with the old man, presented him with sixteen dollars' worth of watchdog?"

"He'll set him upon you if you hav any trouble."

"Um! Hav I no redress?"

"Yes, sir; go and lick the prairie ranger who has stolen away your girl's affections."

"I'll do it!"

"Glad to hear it. I'll defend your case for $20."

"Um!"

"Um!"

"Come to think of it, he is a bigger man than I am."

"Then let him lick you and I'll make it cost him $50!"

"Um! I'll think of it."

"Um! Office hours from 8 A.M. to 6 P.M."

And the young man troubled with inward agitation took himself out.

A FOILED BOOK AGENT.

A young man, with a large book under his arm and a seven-by-nine smile on his mug, stuck his head into the ticket window of the Union Depot and asked the clerk what was the fare to San Antonio.

"Ten dollars and fifteen cents," replied the ticket slinger.

"I am pining to leave Galveston, but I lack just $10 of the ticket money. However, that shan't part us; I'll make a partial cash payment of fifteen cents and take the rest out in trade."

"What do you mean by taking out in trade?"

"I am a book agent, and if you will let me hav the ticket I won't try to sell you a book. I won't say book to you once. This is the most liberal and advantageous offer ever made to the public, and you ought to take advantage of it. I hav been known to talk a sane man so completely out of his senses in fifteen minutes that he wasn't even fit to send to the legislature afterward."

"What book hav you got!" asked the ticket agent.

A beaming smile came over the book agent's face, and in a sing-song voice he began:

"I am offering in seventeen volumes 'Dr. Whiffletree's Observations in Palestine,' a book that should be in every family, a book that comprises the views of the intelligent doctor on what he saw in the holy land, with numerous speculations and theories on what he did not see, altogether forming a complete library of deep research, pure theology, and chaste imagery. I am now offering this invaluable encyclopedia for the unprecedented low price of $2 a volume, which is really giving it away for nothing——"

After the book agent had kept this up for about ten minutes, he began to grow discouraged, for, instead of showing signs of weakening, the ticket agent with an ecstatic smile in his face, begged the eloquent man to keep on.

The book agent stopped to rest his jaw, when the ticket man reached out his hand and said:

"Shake, old fel! Come inside and take a chair, and sing that all over again. That cheers me up like a cocktail. I used to be a book agent myself before I reformed and went into the railroad business, and that is like music to me. It soothes me all over. It calls back hallowed memories of the past, and makes me want to go out on the road again. I would rather pay $20 than hav you leave Galveston. You must come around every day. I could listen to that all day and cry for more."

The book agent shut his book and said:

"Some infernal hyena has given me away; but there is another railroad that I can get out of this one-horse town on. I'll not consent to ride on a road that don't employ gentlemen who can treat a cash customer with common politeness. You can't capture my book on any terms, and if you will come out of your cage I'll punch your head in less time than you can punch a ticket." And he passed out like a beautiful dream.

CONSTANTINOPLE has 45,000 Jews and thirty-eight synagogs. Nearly 40,000 are of Spanish origin.

THE underground military wires in the German empire, according to telegraphic operators, conduct electricity far better than the overland lines.

NEWPORT walls bear the posters of a man who calls himself the Boss Theologian. He advertises a divine chart by which any person can easily find the way to heaven.

"THE doctrin of eternal punishment is a libel on God," said Pastor Brookman of a Montreal Baptist church. Having made this declaration he lost no time in resigning.

THE ordinance against profane swearing is so rigidly enforced at Avon, Illinois, that a plain "damn" is a luxury which costs $3, while fancy oaths can only be indulged in by the very affluent.

THE only form of oath among the Shoshone Indians is: "The earth hears me. The sun hears me. Shall I lie?" This is far more sensible than the oath of civilization, made on a bundle of paper from the printer and bookbinder.

THERE is likely to be litigation over the ownership of a large number of Maryland churches, which hav for many years been used by Methodist Episcopal Church South congregations, but which are now claimed by the Methodist Episcopal church.

THE complete independence of man and wife, where property is concerned, is nowhere carried to such a point as among the Indians of Central America. Every day the husband buys his meals from his wife, who purchases from him raw material for the table.

To the ordinary scourges of the army worm and the potato-bug the year 1881 seems to be adding a new insect pest in the shape of a black asparagus-bug, which easily digests Paris green; and the destructiv locusts in some regions are preparing to take the field.

A HERMIT has built a little house in a tree at Morrisville, Vermont, forty feet from the ground. He has had enough of earth, he says, and desires to liv as far from it as possible. We hav often heard about leaving the world and climbing a tree; this man seems to hav done it.

Is Boston less Christian than New York? The orthodox arguments of Lea, in the play of "Daniel Rochat," received the bulk of the applause here, but in Boston they are received in silence, while Daniel's attacks on Christianity call out "incessant and tiresome rounds of hand-clapping."

Truth says it wants to know "why Jehovah has allowed English-speaking races to grope in darkness for two centuries and a half with a poor translation of his revelations, and whether he used to smile when clergymen preached sermons from the spurious story of the woman taken in adultery."

THE past week was another remarkable week of immigration, and the probabilities are that the total arrivals for May will exceed seventy thousand. Such a number for a single month would be beyond all precedent; it would surpass by more than six thousand the arrivals for the entire year of 1877.

LIGHTNING singled out a $5,000 stallion to kill at Bloomington, Illinois, leaving eleven comparativly valueless horses uninjured. The owner, who had been an earnest Christian, resigned his church membership and resumed a long-neglected habit of profanity, declaring that Providence was against him anyhow.

THE effect on some people of the prophecy falsely ascribed to Mother Shipton, that the world will come to an end in 1881, was illustrated the other day in Indiana, where the sudden appearance of a strange cloud, accompanied by a roaring wind, threw several villages into a panic.

LORD SHAFTESBURY has organized a society of theologians and scientists to investigate all philosophical and scientific questions having a bearing on the truth of the Bible, and to publish results. It will probably be a white-washing affair, and only one verdict will be permitted, and that that the Bible is a divinely-inspired volume.

WHAT was it that caused the sale of two million copies of the revised New Testament in Great Britain on the first day of its publication, and perhaps half a million in this country? Was it idle curiosity, was it a popular fashion, was it a skilfully worked-up business scheme, or was it a real desire to get at what purports to be an improved word of God?—Sun.

A VICAR of a country parish in England had occasion lately to remonstrate with a lowly member of his flock, who has regularly been conspicuous by his absence from the celebration of the holy communion, for his non-attendance. Hodge hazarded the excuse that he didn't consider himself sufficiently qualified to attend. "Why not?" urged the vicar; "you hav been confirmed." "Yes, sir," replied Hodge, "and vaccinated, too; but they neither of 'em took."

SIX trained horses on exhibition in San Francisco are remarkable for having been taught by kindly means. In proof of this the trainer uses no whip in making them do their tricks, and they will readily obey a stranger. The general belief of trainers of beasts is that they can only be controled through fear. If God's servants, the clergy, had discarded efforts of frightening human beings and worked upon the love plan they would doubtless hav been far more successful.

VERMONT is the only state that has not single Chinaman. North Carolina and Delaware hav each one, and Alabama has four. The largest number in any Southern state is 483, and Louisiana is the state. Sugar growing has brought them there. The other states and territories in which they are most numerous are, Pennsylvania, 170; Illinois, 214; Utah, 518; Arizona, 632; New York, 942; Montana, 1,764; Idaho, 3,378; Nevada, 5,423; Oregon, ,515 and California, 75,122.

TO-DAY thoughtful men and women demand facts, not theological fictions; a genuin gospel of peace and good will, not a gospel of delusion; and all signs indicate a response to the demand. The Adlers, Chadwicks, Frothinghams, and other noble souls are the heralds of the better gospel, and the time is at hand when that reason and common sense so serviceable in every other department of human thought and action will be found equally serviceable in the domain of theology and religion.

THE Rev. Mr. Buskirk, a Methodist pastor at Sullivan, Ind., recently got married. Mrs. Jones, who had been converted in one of his revival meetings, took to weeping immediately on hearing of the union. The husband wondered why she felt aggrieved, and, in his search for the cause, found in her trunk a bundle of love-letters from the clergyman. One of these made the matter clear. Buskirk and Mrs. Jones had agreed to marry as soon as Jones should die, which he was expected soon to do. Other letters contained the most ardent protestations of love and some execrable verses. Jones has brought a suit for damages, and Buskirk has been also arraigned by his church.

THERE exists a strong feeling of rivalry between the London and Geneva Socialists. They do not recognize the same leaders, and in many respects their theories differ. This antagonism, which does not exist among the Nihilists, is a source of weakness to both camps, and their internal jealousies and quarrels hav hitherto kept them in such a thoroughly disorganized state that they hav inspired little apprehension abroad. Another important fact connected with them is that they hav no funds. The Nihilists are known to possess money, though little or nothing has been ascertained as to its source; but the Socialist refugees in England, France, and Switzerland are poor, and many of them are almost destitute.

THE Rev. William Dorsey, of Zion Church, Tarrytown, has been "raked over the coals" for marrying a blooming widow of Paterson, N. J., while his lawful wife was living, adding to the crime of bigamy the sin of lying to the confiding widow by telling her his wife was dead. When Sister Richardson testified that she was married to the reverend scoundrel by the assistant pastor of Henry Ward Beecher's church great sensation prevailed, mingled with mutterings of "Whew" and "Ah." A brother from southern New Jersey suggested that the New York papers be asked to publish the affair twice, at which the bishop shook his head mournfully, while a robust brother startled the silence by exclaiming that Bro. Jackson was out of the limits of the conference. "Yes," responded a jealous rival, "he's been there ever since those Yonker sister came here." Bro. Jackson looked sheepishly guilty.

PREACHING to the clergy of his diocese the other day the Protestant Episcopal bishop of Long Island reaffirmed his unshaken personal belief in the supernatural character of the Christian religion and the indestructible vitality of the Christian church. But he owned that there is a spirit of hostility abroad in the world challenging the claims of Christianity, and that many nominal Christians are very weak in the faith. "Somehow," he said, "positiv and earnest convictions are not as general among those who call themselvs Christians as they once were; it does no good to conceal or to deny this." The spirit of the age, according to this observant bishop, is seeking to circumscribe and fetter and enfeeble the church. Modern science is largely arrayed against it. "It is no longer the vast majority," said the bishop, "who attend any kind of worship or listen to any kind of preaching. What defections in Lutheran Germany? What an eclipse or total annihilation of faith among the various branches of the Latin race in Europe and in Central and South America! What almost countless multitudes in this land that never cross a church threshold or conform even outwardly to the spirit or to the traditional customs of the Christian religion!"

WHAT may be accomplished by a brazen pretender is illustrated in the case of W. H. Chase, at Medway, Mass. He arrived in that town an utter stranger two years ago, without letters of introduction or any other means of gaining favor than his own resources. He gave out that he was a wounded veteran officer of the army, ex-member of Gen. Howard's staff, son of a clergyman, ex-editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, and ex-Secretary of the United States Senate Committee on Commerce. He was at once made principal of the high school, and allowed to take a leading position in the Congregational church. He preached in neighboring churches, and became superintendent of a Sunday-school. He went into politics, too, and was a popular stump-speaker during the last Presidential canvass. About this time he was arrested on an old charge of swindling, but managed to hide the scandal by paying the claim. When the crack military company of Boston, the Fusileers, recently visited Washington, it was "Col. Chase, a wounded hero of Gettysburg," who presented them to President Garfield. About this time he secured an increase of salary from the school board by representing that he had been offered the private secretaryship to Secretary Windom; but this has caused his downfall. Somebody wrote to Windom, and the lie was exposed. Then proof was secured that Chase had never been on Gen. Howard's staff, or editor of the Inter-Ocean, or secretary of a Senate Committee. Finally, he has fled from Medway under charges of criminal conduct.

News of the Week.

THE Senate has adjourned.

EX-SENATOR BRUCE, colored, has been appointed Register of the Treasury.

ANOTHER six-day go-as-you-please pedestrian match was started in this city Sunday night.

A BILL has been passed in this state compeling shopkeepers to furnish seats for their sales-ladies.

HALF a million copies of the revised New Testament were sold the first day of its publication in this city.

THREE men were killed and five injured by the falling in of a mine at Terraville, near Deadwood, Dak., on the 19th.

THE Pennsylvania Railroad magnate, Col. Thomas A. Scott, died on the 21st, at his home in Philadelphia, of paralysis.

THE sultan of Turkey has deposed the bey of Tunis, but the French uphold him, which leads to more European complications.

THE First Division N. G. S. N. Y. will parade on Decoration day in this city and be reviewed by Secretary Lincoln and other officials.

ROBERTSON has been confirmed as Collector of this port. William E. Chandler, Blaine's friend, was rejected as Solicitor-General.

IN the telegraph suit Jay Gould testified that he didn't know whether he paid five or ten million dollars for American Union stock.

THE District Attorney has entered a nolle prosequi in the prosecution of the conductors of Truth for publishing the famous Morey letter.

CONKLING and Platt both want to be re-elected to the Senate as a vindication. A great deal of opposition is manifested, and the result is uncertain.

THE British steamer Ganos was run into and sunk in Boston harbor last Friday. The vessel, valued at $160,000, and the cargo, worth $350,000, are a total loss.

THE mechanics of New York, Jersey City, and Brooklyn demand a half holiday on Saturdays without diminution of wages. They will strike unless the concession is granted.

THE Socialists of this city met at Irving Hall last Saturday evening and sent a cable message to the czar protesting against the proposed hanging of Hessy Helfman, accused of participating in the killing of the late czar.

DR. FISHBOUGH, a prominent Spiritualist of Brooklyn, was found dead in his yard last Saturday. It is thought that death was occasioned by falling down the steps and striking a stone, as a wound was found on his head.

THE mayor of Jacksonville, Fla., is a Jew. He is enforcing very strictly the Sunday law, so that nothing but ice, milk, and newspapers can be bought in that city on the Sabbath. The Christians don't like to take their own medicin.

FROM the present temper of the ecclesiastical commission having charge of the case of Rev. Cowley, the child starver, who served a term of imprisonment for his inhuman crime, it looks as though he would be retained in the church and allowed to preach and abuse children at pleasure.

MARTIN KENKOWSKY, of this city, has been arrested as the murderer of the young woman found in the woods of Bergen, N. J., last week. He admits being in her company in Guttenberg, near the place, but says she went off with two other men. The evidence looks strong against him however.

A "CHRISTIAN" wrote to the New York Star last Sunday that the man who would take Col. Ingersoll's life would be "regarded as a benefactor to his race, and would be justified by God and man, for God has so revealed in his holy word; and God in his good time will most certainly select his agent on earth to do his holy work."

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER VI.

"Although I did not want to trouble the slave with expounding theological questions, because I feared to hurt him, he himself turned the conversation toward that point. He spoke with warmth about religion.

"'How,' said I, 'hast thou, then, also a religion, Alamontada?' 'Do you think,' replied he, 'that there is a man without religion? Only the earliest infancy and insanity may be without it?'

"'And what is thine, for thou art considered an Atheist?'

"'I am an outcast from the society of my fellow-brethren,' answered Alamontada; 'therefore it hurts no one's conscience to think and say every evil of me. I hav resigned the friendship of my brothers, therefore I do not dare any more to open my mouth in my own justification. I belong to no one. Had I a joy, who might share it with me? And my sufferings I hav courageously borne alone.'

"He sank into a melancholy silence. Then he raised his eyes again to me and said: 'You ask after my religion. How shall I describe it to you? It is that which the creator himself has revealed within me. The prejudices of the great mass, the immorality of priests and monks, the contradictions of church doctrins with the unshakable truths of nature, awakened in former time my meditation. And this led me out of the bosom of the church into the arms of God.'

"'And didst thou find thyself under all tribulations consoled by thy religion?'

"'Ah, dear sir, consoled? Yes. But for that I suffered no less. Like a friendly talisman religion keeps us above the waves in the shipwrecks of life, that we may not drown. But so rocked in the waves of misery, dear sir, one cannot smile, though heaven might be open before us, as it was before Saint Stephanus.'

"'I congratulate thee that thy faith hath at least helped thee so much. Far from attacking thy religious convictions, as it really is my order, I wish to become acquainted with them that I might, if it were possible, imbue every unfortunate with them.'

"'My religion, dear sir, every one knows. You find it in every quarter of the globe. All nations hav it, only with various ornaments and additions, which are not necessary with me. It is easier for me than any one else to hav it. I am an outcast who no longer belongs to any nation, but still to humanity. Consequently I hav not the religion of a nation, but the religion of humanity, and no one persecutes for it. Also hav the nations never quarreled about religion, but only about its ornaments and human additions. But be this as it may, well to those who died for it. Both were blessed in it.'

"'But how, if thou considerest thy belief the only true one and doubtest no more, if thou art convinced that the religion of others be perhaps delusion and error, how canst thou then call them blessed?'

"'Because they were so. Ah, were I a man, like others, and as I once was and had won the world's confidence and love! Nevertheless I should hav feared the sin to attack the belief of others. The inhabitants of the earth liv in everlasting infancy. They are, without exception, children, and need the leading-strings and the guardian. Their reason always lies in the soft cradle of fancy, and the emotions stand about to rock it. 'Tis true, before them floats almighty nature and testifies with loud voice, There is a God! 'Tis true, in their inmost heart they hav the sacred assurance of eternity, yet their self-reliance is too feeble. They tremble before self-deception. They trust more in a stranger than in a friend. They are in need of revelation. Well, there! Every nation has its god-sent and prophet, and every child trusts his father more than himself. Only few single individuals elevate themselvs. Only few separate ones raise themselvs out of the mass of the millions; they understand the testimony of nature and the assurance in their heart and the light of their mind as the guiding-star of humanity. These are the mature, the god-sent.'

"'But can there not,' said I, 'come a time when the human race will step out of its infancy?'

"'I doubt it,' answered Alamontada. 'By the order of things, whereby we shall eat our bread in the sweat of our brow, the best part of our life passes everywhere behind the plow, at the loom, in the barn, and at the helm of the ship in the service of earthly wants. Only to a few has it been granted to dedicate their days to the sciences. There may come a century when finally the people will possess as their own the results of philosophy and natural sciences, the fruit of painful examinations in all fields of human knowledge; there may appear a century when even religion, in its quiet simplicity and freed from all sensual show, will be the religion of the people; but never will the people be able to examin for themselvs. They will not take the grand and simple doctrins and principles direct from the first source, but receive them with confidence in the wisdom of the teacher; and as it will be then, so it is now. The people cling with faith to him who is to them an anointed one of higher knowledge with the faith which the child brings to his parents, the patient to his physician. Gray prejudices will perish, but new ones will arise in their places. Men will become more skilled, more educated, more humane. They will one day shudder before the time of barbarity in which we now liv, and, notwithstanding, will never step entirely out of the condition of infancy.'

"'I doubt,' said I, 'if the human race, while it is training itself and rejoices in a higher degree of understanding and tenderness, shall at the same time see less of misery.'

"'Why not? Oh, verily, dear sir, among a refined people I never should hav spent the most beautiful half of my days in chains and in the dungeon. Do you not believe that with the progress of civilization of the nations public welfare increases and misery diminishes? So compare for a moment the civiilzed nations of our time with the barbarous hordes which stand only on the lowest step of culture; share for a moment with them the anxiety of superstition, the wildness of burning passion, the inhumanity of their wars, the cruelty of their clumsy justice, the bitter fruits of ignorance in every domain —compare the well-to-do European of our century with the thrifty man of the middle ages of our era. The development of the manifold abilities of human nature increases the enjoyments and pleasures of life. The destruction of hurtful prejudices, the continued conquests in the realms of science, diminish the number of evils, and giv to the soul gradually a greatness and power, with which it lifts itself above even unavoidable evils.

"'Let yourself,' continued Alamontada, 'not be misled by the stubbornness of poets and the whims of philosophers who in the refinement of the nations see only an increase of evil; and since in the world of reality nothing answers to their ideals of general happiness, they place them in the days of antiquity or of a better future—days which no one has ever seen, and which no one will ever liv to see. For it belongs to the weakness of mankind always to be surrounded by wishes; it belongs to every-day delusions to find the hours of the past and the future more charming than the present. The present is only a fleeting point of time; it is flown while we think of it, and another floats by before we expected it. Our emotions are divided among these atoms of time. Only in the recapitulation of a whole row of them we recognize their value. On that account are neither pleasures nor dangers so beautiful or terrible in the momentary present as when we await their coming; and both again receive brighter colors as soon as they belong to the past. We praise the blissfulness of childish life; but if a god would giv us the choice perfectly free, who would want to be placed back there? Let poets and philosophers who accuse the civilization of nations build them huts among the Cherokees or Finns, among the wandering Tartars or the Bedouins and Moors, and wait if they praise their lot.'

"So spoke Alamontada. I listened to him with pleasure; my interruptions served only to coax new thoughts out of him."

Ecce Diabolus.

Some years ago a work appeared in England under the title of "Ecce Homo," which at the time created quite a sensation. It was followed by a reply called "Ecce Deus," which was very weak compared with its predecessor. As these works treated of the Christian idea of deity in his attributes of man and God, so I hav in this little pamphlet tried to exhibit him as he is, also this redoubtable personage who has so long been held up as a bugaboo to children, both youthful and those older children who hav grown gray believing in the individuality of this devil.

Tracing Christianity back to Rome, we find its birthplace in pagan myths. From Rome to Greece, from Greece to Egypt, from Egypt to Hindostan, from Hindostan to Iran, from Iran through northern Europe to Britain, we find the same ideas embodied in their theology or mythology, whichever you please to call it. As we get further back into these hoary ages we find the complex ideas of modern Christianity and Roman paganism becoming simpler; personages fade into attributes; art, with its elaborate, imaginativ conceptions of deities, is resolved into hard, plain facts, these facts the result of carefully recorded observations which had been handed down for untold ages. Polytheism reverts to monotheism, and the one God of the ancients shines forth as the great day star, the sun. The various positions as he passes through the zodiacal signs are elevated in later ages into minor deities, and planet and star-worship is added until the multiplicity of attributes becomes an utter confusion, and out of this heterogeneous mass the Christian theology is made up. It is probable enough that objections will be made to the assertion that the Druids of Britain were the first people who taught this theology and commenced the work of civilization and education. To those who doubt this idea I wish to show briefly: First, the philological identity of these myth-god names and the Keltic names, and the universal use of the zodiac with its twelve signs, the tracing back of the elaborate astronomy of the Egyptians to simpler and fundamental ideas of lesser growth, and of an earlier period of the world's education.

The splendid civilization of Egypt, which embodied its astronomical truths in gigantic monuments of stone which stand to this day, showed a lofty standard of education and a grandeur of conception that surpasses anything that the world has seen since. These ruins attest to-day the ideas of the people who reared them. The ruins of temples in India attest the same idea. So also do the Druidic circles which are scattered from Britain through Gaul, over the summits of the Pyrenees to the desert of Sahara in Africa, through Scandinavia and northern Russia, Persia, over the Himalayas to India.

The Druidic temples are the expression of the ideas of a people who lived in the stone age, hence their name Kelts, from kallt, a flint. Hence the flint weapons of this people are called to this day Celts. From kall tor (i. e., cutting flint), a rude instrument for digging, we hav the coulter of the plow, culture, and cultivation of later languages.

The megalithic temples of these Kelts show neither trace of hammer or chisel, but stand as monuments of the first examples of united human effort and intelligent calculation found in the known world. Art had not been born when these temples were reared. This is an indisputable proof of their antiquity.

The zodiac, in common use among the oriental nations, is another proof of its Keltic origin. The signs adopted will not correspond to any locality or climate but that of some island at least in 50° north latitude. To a southern latitude they do not apply at all.

The zodiac, Rama of India, crops out in these myths unmistakably—Ram Samee, the Hindoo god, son of the zodiac, who was crucified; Ab Ram, father of Ram, the Jewish Patriarch. In Rama, Ra Hel weeps for her children, and she had but two (Gemini). The standards of the twelve tribes were zodiacal symbols. In Joseph's dream the sun, moon, and the twelve constellations bowed to him. We hav twelve tribes, twelve apostles, and the Christ story is the sun's annual course. How could an uncivilized people like these painted, skin-clad Kelts hav conceived such an elaborate science as astronomy? will naturally be asked.

Eating and drinking are two prime questions in the economy of every living being. Thus the ancient Kelts by actual observation learned that the advent of certain stars or constellations upon the morning horizon indicated the change of seasons and advent or disappearance of the means of sustenance. At sundown they retired to hide in their caves or burrows during the darkness, but at dawn they sallied forth hungry to seek for the means to sustain. In the twilight of morning, only the brightest stars were visible, and they naturally took more notice of those upon the Eastern horizon where they expected the sun, their deity, to appear. Hence they associated these stars with different processes of nature. In Capricorn their God began visibly to lengthen the day. In Aquarius the January thaw (peculiar to Britain) set in. In February the salmon swarmed up the rivers to spawn, and herring were plenty upon the coast, hence the sign Pisces to designate the advent of a food supply. In March the sheep cast their lambs, and the sun's rays were visibly warmer. Sheep shed their wool and indicated the necessity of shearing them. The sun-god was the herald of the coming summer, and in his martial advent was termed the civilizer (Dovydh, i. e., Davydh, David), hence March 1st is St. David's day. Upon the 21st he displayed his radial symbol above the horizon, tri phalla (three rays), from which word we hav phallic, applied to the virile energy of the sun impregnating the earth at this period.

This was the grand festival, Nauros of the fire worshipers of Iran, the New Year, Alban Eilir of the Kelts. Phaladr Hü (rays of Hü) is the original of Phadrig (Patrick), who makes his advent into the golden isle Eur Juys, Erin, with the triple symbol in his hand ☘ the trefoil. As this would be too apparent if St. Patrick's day were upon the 21st, the day was changed to the 17th. This ram or lamb figures extensivly in the Bible history and caused a schism in Egypt when the sun in his precession through the equinoxes had receded from Taurus into Aries. The priests of Heliopolis (On) held to the bull Apis, but the schismatics held to the ram. The Bible asserts that the Jews reverted to the worship of Apis when they set up the golden calf.

The next symbol or constellation indicated the process of impregnation which the earth underwent, and in later times, when cultivation was understood, signified the time to yoke the bulls for plowing, hence Tarus.

In the next sign Gemini, the alternations of sunshine and shower, heat and moisture, were indicated as the developing, ripening process, and in Cancer he was Lord of the host of heaven, Hü Dad in Hevin. It was the middle of the course, as the six claws upon either side of the crab indicate; Alban Hefin, the summer solstice. We hav seen the Irish children lighting fires upon St. John's eve (June 20th), never dreaming that this custom is the perpetuation of the Beltane, Baal Tan, Bale Fire, and the custom of dragging some one through it savors strongly of the rites of Moloch. The Egyptians erected a luiga to represent this idea. Hü was lord of the higher and lower ray, causer of life, and destroyer of life. He represented the number 4, the square in form, hence the obelisk was square and the crab Cancer indicated his position. Each face of the lingar represented one of his positions, as Alban Father, Albanque Patres, i. e., winter and summer solstice, vernal and autumnal equinox. He was a triple personage, and was represented by three crowned eagles (birds of the sun), while a column of hieroglyphics directly under each bird gave his title and attributes. These hieroglyphics served the purpose of teaching the ignorant populace of that day, much the same as the cartoons of the illustrated papers are more effectiv than the reading matter. They were word pictures, and any attempt to decipher them as syllables will not succeed. The hieratic writing of the Egyptian priests is very similar in its character to the Keltic bardic cryptograph, and is evidently derived from that source. The pyramidon of the linga signifies the middle ray of the tri phalla, the generator, the sustainer of life.

In July the sun was fierce as a lion, and as Herod he slew the twins or destroyed their work, vegetation ripened, dried, withered, died. And Hü sank into the lap of the virgin, came to the wedding with bread and wine at Cana. Here we find a word meaning a feast corresponding to the Canna of India, Coena of the Latins, Kiniaw of the Kelts, meaning the same, the principal meal of the day. This was the saturnalia of Bacchus and other pagan feasts held at that period of the year and perpetuated in the harvest home of present times. Now the two fishes of February (Pisces) and the five loaves of bread (March, April, May, June, July, during which the corn and grapes ripen) feed the multitude, and twelve basketfuls are left over, i. e., a supply of food for a whole year.

In Libra he lays down his scepter, loses his energy, and sinks below the horizon—Arawn, the sacrificer of himself, hence Aaron. Now is the New Year of the Jews, the seventh month, September; the worshipers of the Evil One seek to propitiate him by sacrifice and death.

Scorpio makes his advent next; the serpent born of the water crawls over the land and blights the trees, freezes the water, and is the herald and precursor of Arthan (winter). The hunter next takes to the chase with bow and arrow, and Sagittarius is symbol of the time. In this sign the underworld opens and all the evil influences rush forth, perpetuated by All Saints' Day, Halloween. Here stands Cailan and Cailas, the black virgin, the mortal terror, the foe of the threshold. She is the goddess Kali Bhawanee of the Thugs, and delights in murder. Cailas is the original Cœlus, and here all the good Christians go after death. Capricorn next appears. Hü is shorn of his beams, and as the black Sun, the bald, dies, hence it is called the place of the skull (Golgotha). He is Saturn, Said Wrn (from Said virility, wrn, tomb, or urn). He descends into hell for three days, and is born upon Christmas day, passing on to where the old man, Janus, who, with the double face, sees the old year and the new, stands.

Criticising the Critics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am tempted to offer some words of a critical character on "An Entirely New and Original Demonstration on Soul or Spirit and Its Certain Materiality and Mortality," by J. S. Walker.

Mr. Walker imagins that he has scooped up the whole batch of isms and philosophies in a few brief, but vague, sentences about soul and its materiality, etc. He imagins that if he can show that a soul is a material thing, then it must follow that it cannot be immortal, and must die, as all materiality is subject to death. Now this proposition is a flat contradiction of nature, science, or all known philosophy. Materiality is constantly changing, but never dies. Science teaches that matter exists always and in every place. There is no spot in the universe that does not contain it. Matter and the force that moves it are constantly associated. He says, "Mind without body is like shadow without substance." Well, what idiot denies this? Who asserts that anybody manifesting intelligent life has no mind? But are there no substances that fail to cast a shadow? Electricity is a substance. Has Mr. Walker discovered its shadow? Does he see the wind's shadow? Are not the various gases substance? and what sort of shadows do they cast? There are many things substantial that do not cast a shadow, and for what Mr. Walker knows, that substance that records the thoughts of man may also exist without the shadow which he thinks of necessity must accompany it.

He says: "Not one Deist, religionist, or Spiritualist in five hundred ever had one positiv, natural, and clear idea on soul or spirit, or of philosophical necessity." "These subjects are left for such men, such mighty geniuses, such intellectual giants, as Hobbes, Helvetius, D'Holbach, Hume, Mill, Reade, Greg, Huxley, Tyndall, Maudsley, Ingersoll, Underwood, and some others." I may add, and Mr. Walker. Unfortunately for the reputation of his "geniuses," some of them never could, some never would, and some of them never hav investigated one of the isms, and are either too much prejudiced, too thick-headed, or too fearful of the world's skepticism, to acknowledge the truth.

The men of science who hav reared for themselvs great monuments in certain directions of thought are the last ones to come down from their pedestals upon which they sit to be admired by a doting public. They hav never investigated Spiritualism, and hav not pretended to. Huxley said, "If true, I hav no interest in it." Ingersoll swore that the writing purporting to come from his spirit father, on a double slate, through the mediumship of Dr. Slade, was not written by Slade; but has he followed up the inquiry? No. Mr. Ingersoll's lectures on ghosts, and other positions he has taken, are too popular, his lectures are too much in demand, and they pay too well to spoil them by becoming a believer in a spirit life, so he keeps away, and at a great distance is, like others, demanding a shadow.

Mr. Walker asserts that "the soul or spirit is the mere shade, appearance, and shadow of the body acting and moving in one or more places in space. Like sound, color, flavor, odor, and motion, or any one of the senses, a mere fleeting, perishable, appurtenance, or manifestation of organized matter." Therefore the immortality of a human soul or spirit is a positiv physical impossibility. Unfortunately for Mr. Walker's "rational and sound idea" of soul or spirit, it will bear no such definition whatever. The senses are not the shadowy things he is pleased to call them. The sensations are the real effects of this organization of body, and are so intimately related to the whole body and to each other that when one suffers all suffer. When a man has a leg cut off, is it the leg only that suffers pain, or is the whole condition of the man's surroundings taken into the account of his sufferings? The mental pain occasioned by the reflection of the mind and its responsibilities (which it feels it cannot now meet) often are more acute than the physical loss itself. When a man by a reflection of something in his mind or consciousness is thrown into the most agonizing state of mind so as to produce insanity and even death, there must be something more in his mental structure to bring forth these agonizing pictures than mere shadows. The body, you will please to remember, may be perfectly healthy, and were it not for the inward conscious self, could but enjoy a pleasant life. Yet the bloody hand of Queen Elizabeth will present itself, daguerreotyped upon the mental substance, as imperishable as when it was first made bloody. The wasting of the body by the necessary changes of organic life has gone on so that not a particle of what it once was is retained; but the imperishable fact and its picture are always present. You see, friend Walker, that your shadow theory is not a correct interpretation of nature. There is a substance more enduring than an odor, color, or shadow in this.

Your demonstration is a peculiar piece of logic, because A and B know that they each exist, and because this knowledge does not make another man, for instance, say C, therefore A and B do not exist, and hav no knowledge. This is argumentum absurdum. No person in the universe contends that A's and B's knowledge constitutes a spirit, and no sane man has ever argued that the knowledge of two men made a third, or that any one idea constituted a spirit. If you are fond of making such men of straw and then setting fire to them to make your shadow, all right, but do not presume to call it a correct idea of soul or spirit.

You assert that knowledge, spirit, or soul is "simply the action of the brain called thinking." My dear sir, your ideas imply very peculiar definitions. Knowledge cannot be an act. It implies thinking that has already been done. Knowledge is a result of previous thinking, a remembrance of something already learned and retained in the memory, a something which has been impressed in this imperishable substance called spirit. The great trouble with you is that you put the cart before the horse, and insist that the cart pulls the load instead of the horse. Matter is the cart and load, but the thing that moves it is a force intimately related to it, in fact inseparable from it. Matter cannot exist without it. An act implies an actor. Motion implies a force. Now it follows that the act cannot be the actor; the motion cannot be the force. When a pair of legs get up and run away in the direction of an eating-house, it is not because the legs want something to eat, but the animal that owns and controls them does, so he wills them to carry his stomach to the table, and he wills his hands to supply his mouth, and his mouth to appropriate the food to his stomach. In this case acts of the legs are not spirit, the act of the hands is not soul, the acts of the mouth and stomach cannot be a spirit any more than the act of thinking to do them, but the real life, soul, spirit, was behind each and every one of these acts, and by force of the will caused it to be accomplished. If an act is soul or spirit, or if motion is, then you hav no more right to trace an act of the hand or leg to the brain than to the man in the moon. Why should you trace an act that implies hunger to the brain instead of the stomach? or why trace the motion of the legs to the brain if your definition is correct?

You make an assertion that is so flatly opposed to all philosophy, in saying that no respectable scientist believes in the property of "inertia" in matter, that I am astonished. It would be proper to state who those scientists are that so differ. It is a known law of matter that while it has molecular life and motion, as a mass it has no power to move itself. A rock might lie before your door forever, and could not move itself away, nor has it the power, as a mass, to stop itself when put in motion. To contradict such palpable truths, you are throwing yourself in the face of mathematics, which demonstrate that "any motion observed in a moving mass of matter is the result of one or more external forces operating upon it." If I were to push a boat from the shore with sufficient force it would land at the opposit shore in a direct line of the force applied provided that the water was placid and the air calm, but if the stream ran rapidly its force against the boat would act in conjunction with my force applied, and it would land at a different place lower down the stream. If, however, a high wind were blowing in the opposit direction to the stream, it might land the boat up the stream from my point or completely carry it away. It must be seen from this illustration that the law of inertia is completely asserted, and no Materialist hypothesis can set it aside. The boat was completely at the mercy of the various forces applied.

Your final proposition is, however, equally absurd, although you express unlimited confidence in it, asserting that no future science or wisdom "can shake or move it." "First, that all reason, logic, and science prove that there can be no creation of any real being or actual entity. Secondly, that such being cannot be annihilated. Third, that all consciousness, identity, and individuality had a beginning at birth and are annihilated during sleep." Where, when, and by whom has it been taught that consciousness and identity and individuality are annihilated during sleep? What book on science teaches such absurdities? Does any sane man believe that when a person goes to sleep his individuality dies and is annihilated? This is another one of your men of straw, and is the mere shadow of truth. When sensible people argue immortality from such a state of the case as you mention, your logic will be invincible.

Your "scientific principles" are mere assertions, and your conclusions are absurd, as see the following: You say that "every thought or spirit or soul created at birth and annihilated during sleep, created again on waking, and all through life created at one time and annihilated at another, is not a real entity or actual being, but merely the quality of an entity or property of a being, therefore exists not forever."

You first lay down the proposition that there can be no creation of any real being or actual entity, and in the next breath you assert that "the thoughts, knowledge, spirit, or soul is not a real entity, or actual being, but is the quality of an entity, or property of a real being." That is, they are the property or a quality of a thing that you say cannot exist, and which reason, wisdom, or science cannot admit the creation of. Such reasoning I am astonished at. To annihilate anything is to utterly and forever destroy it beyond the possibility of any recreation or revival into life. And yet what a man has attained in knowledge before sleep he has at his command on waking. If this were not so, you might lie down to sleep with your profundity of material science, some night, and wake up in the morning minus all that you ever knew. But the fact that you do not is a standing argument against your annihilation theory. It requires hard labor to acquire, systematize, and perfect knowledge. It would be a great pity if the whole world had to relearn all it knew each successiv morning of life.

Your propositions and some of your ideas are new, quite original, so far as I know, but I think they are not in accordance with experience, sound sense, logic, and good judgment. They are self-destructiv and contradictory. I will take the liberty to say to you that you should revise your logic some bright morning when all traces of former ideas on soul or spirit hav been annihilated, and see if you cannot discover some trace of an individual entity somewhere about your own existence. J. R. PERRY.

THE conscience is merely an organ of the intellect, and is altered, improved, or vitiated, according to the direction which it receives, and the incidents which act upon it.— Winwood Reade.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1881.

The Revised New Testament.

No book has ever been issued which has attracted so much attention in the same length of time as the new revision of the New Testament. In Great Britain and in the United States it is safe to say four million copies hav been disposed of in the last ten days. One firm in this city sold over 300,000 in one day, mostly wholesale lots to dealers in various parts of the country. Everybody is talking about the revised New Testament. Thousands are reading it who never read the Testament before.

On Sunday last a large proportion of the clergymen in the Protestant churches of this city based their discourses upon the new revision. The way in which it is received seems to vary. Some seem to think that the eighty men who hav devoted ten years to revising the Old and New Testaments hav literally thrown their time away, and that one man in half the time could hav performed the work far better, while others seem to think that the new revision will be a decided improvement upon the old; that obsolete words and phrases are expurgated, and that the words which the divine spirit really meant to hav in the new revision are more faithfully expressed. It should be a source of grief with ardent, faithful souls that their deity has been so long misrepresented in this way.

Others again, upon seeing the old familiar phraseology to which their hearts hav been wedded for years thus brushed away at one stroke, felt that the new word of God is far inferior to the old one, and they wish that the revisers had been furnished with more useful occupation. The tendency of the new revision will doubtless be to lessen the reverence heretofore accorded to the New Testament, to convince people that it is little more divine than other books, and that man had as much to do with it as any other book that has been published.

It is a source of joy—except to those who wish a hell for their unbelieving neighbors—that "hell" and the "bottomless pit" hav been dispensed with in the new revision. We shall be very glad to bid a final adieu to hell and the bottomless pit. It seems the word "miracle" is also dispensed with, and the word is rendered power.

When we reflect upon the millions upon millions of copies of the Bible that hav been issued by the different Bible societies and Bible publishers in the world; upon the vast sums of money that hav been expended in this way; of the great diversity of opinions that hav arisen from it; of the countless army of priests and interpolators that hav been required to explain it to the masses, and most of all the little real use it has been to the world, it can easily be understood that it would hav been quite as well if the volume of a false cosmogony, a record of wars and bloodshed, tribal experiences, generativ or social incidents, Jewish poetry, incoherent ravings, and metaphysical absurdities had never been written or printed. This new revision will doubtless help to dispel the erroneous veneration which has hitherto been accorded to it.

Rededication of Paine's Monument.

Let it not be forgotten that on Monday next, the 30th inst., a meeting will take place at New Rochelle, in Westchester county, on the New York and New Haven railroad, some eighteen miles from this city. It is believed a goodly number of people from this city and from the surrounding country will be there, if the day is not unpleasant, and that interesting speeches will be made by several persons from this city and other places.

The greater number of persons will leave the city on the 10 A. M. train, and will be ready to join in the procession from the depot to the monument at 11 A.M. It is hoped that every friend who desires to do honor to the memory of Thomas Paine, and can conveniently make the little pleasure trip, will join with us on that occasion.

THE Spiritualists of Ohio will hold a meeting May 28th and 29th at Bradies Lake. This will giv the friends an opportunity to inspect the place proposed for a permanent camp ground.

JOHN R. KELSO begins a series of five lectures or more on the subject, "Deity Analyzed," at Virginia City, Nev., June 5, 1881.

W. F. JAMIESON is at present delivering lectures in central Illinois. He will giv five lectures in Shelbyville, May 29th, June 2d and 5th; also five lectures in Mongo, Ind., June 12th, 16th, and 19th. Address him accordingly.

New Publications.

Life of Voltaire. By James Parton. In two volumes, 8vo. of 650 pages each. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

We hav received a copy of this remarkable work, but hav not yet had time to look it over sufficiently to giv an intelligent review. In a week or two we hope to be able to giv it a somewhat extended notice, though we doubt our ability to do it full justice.

Mr. Parton has had this work in hand many years, and has given it his best thought and care. He has written several excellent biographies, which rank equal to any the world has produced, but this is the crowning work of his life. His soul has been wrapped up in it, and his best energies hav been devoted to it. It will undoubtedly meet with a large sale, and through its pages the American public will learn much more of the great French thinker and writer than they hav known before. We hope to receive many orders for the work from our reading patrons. Price, $3 per volume, postage included.

History of Woman Suffrage. Edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Joslyn Gage. Illustrated with steel engravings. Fowler & Wells, 753 Broadway, New York. Published in two octavo volumes.

Vol. I.—1848 to 1861—of this elaborate work is before us, containing 878 pages and fine steel engravings of Frances Wright, Ernestine L. Rose, Frances D. Gage, Clarina I. Howard Nichols, Paulina W. Davis, Lucretia Mott, Antoine L. Brown, Amelia Bloomer, Susan B. Anthony, M. C. Wright, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Matilda Joslyn Gage. This work contains a full history of the Woman Suffrage movement, and will prove very interesting to those favorable to that subject. The preface opens in this way:

"In preparing this work our object has been to put into permanent shape the few scattered reports of the Woman Suffrage movement still to be found, and to make it an arsenal of facts for those who are beginning to inquire into the demands and arguments of the leaders of this reform. Although the continued discussion of the political rights of woman during the last thirty years forms a most important link in the chain of influences tending to her emancipation, no attempt at its history has been made. In giving the inception and progress of this agitation, we who hav undertaken the task hav been moved by the consideration that many of our co-workers hav already fallen asleep, and that in a few years all who could tell the story will hav passed away. In collecting material for these volumes most of those of whom we solicited facts hav expressed themselves deeply interested in our undertaking and hav gladly contributed all they could, feeling that those identified with this reform were better qualified to prepare a faithful history with greater patience and pleasure than those of another generation possibly could."

Volume I. is divided into fifteen chapters and an appendix, treating upon the following general subjects: Preceding Causes; Woman in Newspapers; The World's Anti-Slavery Convention, London, June 12, 1840; New York; Mrs. Collins' Reminiscences; Ohio; Reminiscences by Clarina I. Howard Nichols; Massachusetts; Indiana and Wisconsin; Pennsylvania; Lucretia Mott; New Jersey; Mrs. Stanton's Reminiscences; New York; Woman, Church, and State.

The work is elaborate, able, reliable, and authentic, giving a complete history of the movement which must sooner or later result in woman's emancipation.

Price, $5.00 per volume. Vol. II. will be issued in the coming autumn.

Modern Facts vs. Popular Thought. A Rythmical Lecture. By Nettie Pease Fox. Delivered on the Thirty-third Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, March 31, 1881.

This is a pamphlet of thirty-two pages, and is a very readable poem. As a specimen, the following extract will serve to giv a very fair idea of the work. Price, 10 cents, or twelve copies for $1.

"Modern facts hav been slowly inter-wrought
With the somber folds of popular thought;
Popular thought by the priesthood led,
By religion shaped, on religion fed,
Presents a personal God dwelling apart,
Molding all matter with infinit art,
Calling with human voice from mountain hight,
Walking in cool of the day with calm delight;
Toiling, growing weary, and wanting rest,
A God who cursed, and a God who blessed;
A God of anger and a God of love,
Whose bright home was in the pure realms above;
A God who commanded every nation
To bow to him in self-abnegation,
Liv by faith, trample reason in the dust,
And in the Christians' savior put their trust;
To look upon human nature as vile,
The taint of sin even in childhood's smile;
The heart deceitful—that pure, hallowed shrine,
Where all love's bright, glittering jewels shine;
The earth a prison-house, a place of gloom,
And life a weary journey to the tomb.

Religion was a heavy-knotted cord
To lash poor sinners till they loved the Lord.
Duty was obedience to forms and creeds,
Singing hymns, repeating prayers, counting beads,
Building churches, wearing solemn faces,
Sustaining missions, were Christian graces.
The object of life to prepare to die,
To secure a bright mansion up on high;
Deny the brain the living bread of thought,
Deny the heart the holy love it sought;
Deny the mind growth, power to expand,
The spirit knowledge of a better land;
Then die and enter the abode of the blessed,
There meet the noblest, purest, and best.

None of the faithless ever enter there,
They could not inhale that heavenly air.
None of the philosophers of Greece or Rome,
They hav been sent to a warmer home.
No scholar of China or India we find,
No one who sought the culture of mind;
No inventors or reformers we see,
From all such disturbers heaven is free.
No Phillips or Garrison tyranny shake,
No Paine or Ingersoll make bigotry quake.
No Wright, Anthony, or Stanton up here,
All such women would be out of their sphere.
No Davis, Richmond, nor Fox sisters there,
They hav been excluded with infinit care.
No spirits who hav been rapping around
When they should hav been quiet under ground.
No Universalists, we know full well
They do not believe in an orthodox hell.
No Unitarians, they are under ban,
Believing that Jesus was only a man.
No Free Religionists, they do not know
That man has a soul or where it will go.
No Spiritualists, their savior is truth;
They are lost, every one, the aged and youth."

The American Tailor. Root & Tinker. New York: Conducted by Daniel Edward Ryan.

This is a twenty-four page quarto, illustrated with diagrams, cuts, etc. Mr. Ryan is an earnest Liberal, a warm personal friend of ours, and we take special pleasure in noticing the worthy trade journal with which he is connected. We are satisfied it stands at the head of its profession, and that every tailor in the country should be its patron. In his salutatory, Mr. Ryan says: "The time has come when the intelligence which has guided all other professions to honor, to eminence, and a status, should in our case be applied for the same results. To attain this end a representativ journal, owned and conducted in the interest of tailors for the interchange of ideas and discoveries, is absolutely necessary. Hence this one, my support of it, and my present position." For the latest styles and improvements, and for all information pertaining to the tailoring business, its columns should be regularly consulted. Issued monthly at $3 per year. Root & Tinker, 182 Nassau street, New York.

The Scientific Investigator. Devoted to Science, Art, Spiritual Philosophy, and Radical Reform. Published monthly by the Investigator Company, at Portland, Oregon.

We hav received a few numbers of this able, promising periodical, and are pleased to be able to speak of it in the highest terms. Its articles are well written, its selections are good, and it seems entirely worthy of the support of Liberals and Spiritualists. Its subscription price is $1 per year, and it is already talking about becoming a weekly at an early day. We wish it success.

The Freethinker. G. W. Foote, editor. Published monthly in London, England.

The first number of this sprightly candidate for Freethought is before us. Its articles are short and pointed, and it seems to possess the spiciness, interest, and ability to make it a popular journal. We wish it a prosperous future.

"An Infidel Abroad."

There are many ways of looking upon the Old World, many eyes with which to view its wonders, and many hearts through which to interpret its marvelous history. The poet can say one thing, the thinker another, the religionist another, and the artist blends all with varying colors. It seems as if we who stay at home must know all about the old world by this time, for innumerable books hav been written, and photographs taken, and pictures painted, and in these latter days its news comes throbbing across the Atlantic every hour, and its wondrous life is flashed into all our papers. What new can be said? Much one will find out if they will read "An Infidel Abroad?"

Here is a fresh insight. We hav not the poet or artist, or saint steeped in the lore of the ages, but the modern man—the keen-eyed traveler—the sharp observer. The romance is stripped off, and the plain reality appears; and yet the reality is made supremely interesting. There is no bowing down to idols, be they poetic or artistic or ecclesiastical. There is a manly and straightforward look at everything. We hav the typical Yankee, keen, shrewd, quick, jovial, and a bit saucy. He has no reverence for the pope's toe, and won't kiss it, and the almost million saints are at a discount. Still, he omits nothing in description. He is attentiv, and a faithful portraiture is made. We see the old cathedrals, the shrines, the images, the altars, the mountains, and the cities, in clear and brilliant coloring. We hav the hard common sense of the Infidel and the enthusiasm of the reformer. As he traverses the well-worn fields of ancient progress he recognizes that the battle is not yet won, and the Old World is but half-way toward the dream and hope of humanity.

While he thus sketches the dissolving views of the old-time superstitions passing to their eternal doom—he catches and reveals the thrills and splendors of the new soul that is in the hearts of the people. The "Infidel Abroad" finds many an Infidel at home there doing a manly and successful work. This is one of the greatest uses of the book, that it brings us acquaintance with the underlying thought of the Old World. It shows that the crust is heaving and the lava fire is beneath. In the frame of the dead past is seen the gathering of new forces.

Mr. Bennett is a man of extraordinary vision. He sees everything that is going on. He is a perpetual inquirer; he traces effects to their causes, and he allows no chain of fact to escape. He is thoroughly philosophic. There is logic in his book from beginning to end, and the logic at the close is simply tremendous. To use a homely phrase, "it knocks things." Theology receives a blow that staggers it. The "Infidel Abroad" carries a sledge-hammer of incisiv criticism. The Old World, theologically, is turned topsy-turvy, and we see it as it never was seen before, and so seeing it we see it more truthfully than ever before.

If one wants to see a plain matter-of-fact picture of the Old World, he must read Mr. Bennett's book. He describes innumerable objects with the faithfulness of a Defoe. If one wishes to see what is going on in the Old World, what art and invention and progress there is, he must read Mr. Bennett's book, and if he wishes to know the inward spirit of the people, what is vibrating in the masses, and what splendid hopes they hav, as voiced by such noble men and women as Bradlaugh, Besant, and their coadjutors, let him read Mr. Bennett's book. It it a treasury of hard facts and flowing thoughts.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Letter from Lucy N. Colman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I send you a set of resolutions, which were adopted at an informal meeting held in our city of Syracuse last evening, which I trust you may find space to publish in your paper. Parker Pillsbury came into the city all unannounced, and of course we had little time to call a meeting, but a sufficient number came together to produce a very lively, interesting meeting. The new outrage upon the rights of the people in denying certain papers transit through the mails was warmly discussed, and at last the resolutions were adopted with only one dissenting, and that not very positiv.

For myself, I confess that the outlook for freedom of utterance seems to be darkening; but we still hav THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator. But if Anthony Comstock and his upholders are successful in getting the legislature to pronounce their infamy law, how long will those papers be allowed to visit our homes? Not long, I think.

What shall we do when you leave us to travel round the world? Will there be space in your paper given to do the work of here and now when you are away, thinking and writing of there and then. "Charity begins at home," is a good proverb, and oh, how much you are needed right here at home! I am glad, to be sure, that Parker Pillsbury, who may be very properly styled the conscience in our work, T. B. Wakeman, the expounder, and T. C. Leland, the hopeful and brilliant organizer, will be left with us. No one need fear they will be "caught napping," but then I am sad at your leaving. I suppose you must go, and we must be reconciled. May all good influences attend you! I hope you will enjoy the trip, if you must take it. My love to Mrs. Bennett, and continued regards for yourself.

These are the resolutions:

Resolved, That the people should know that an incorporated association exists in this state known as the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. That, through the lying pretensions of its unscrupulous agents, it has succeeded in establishing a daring and despotic censorship over the United States mails and the public press by an act of Congress passed under circumstances shamefully disgracefully to that body; and that under that act a number of useful, reputable, and valuable public journals in New York and Boston hav been excluded from the mails on the pretended charge that they contain matter unfit for publication and circulation.

Resolved, That it should also be known and remembered that this society is at this moment before the state Legislature, by its authorized agent, asking for a law or bill which shall greatly enlarge its jurisdiction and increase its irresponsible powers, when it has already inflicted fines of thousands of dollars and long and dreary imprisonments on innocent citizens for expressing, publishing, and circulating their honest thought and opinions on subjects the most vital to the life, health, and well-being of man, woman, and child.

Resolved, That the thanks of every friend of freedom and justice are due to Hon. T. B. Wakeman, of New York, for so promptly and generously appearing before the Committee of the Assembly to oppose such unrighteous legislation as was demanded. And we earnestly recommend the widest possible circulation of the eloquent and unanswerable argument delivered by him on that occasion, and just issued in pamphlet form from THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Faithfully, LUCY N. COLMAN.

Criticisms on the Declaration.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The criticisms on the style of the Declaration of Independence, by "A Hater of Shams," are partly just and partly captious. But I am happy to announce that in an article next week, of moderate length, I shall be able to prove that the just criticisms do not apply to the original draft of the Declaration, but to its amendments made either in committee or in Congress, and that the criticisms, both just and unjust, serve only to fix more firmly the authorship of the original draft on Thomas Paine, and to identify him with Junius. W. H. B.

Washington, D. C., May 22d.

Comstock Sat Upon.

The Philadelphia Inquirer of the 20th says:

"Anthony Comstock, agent for the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, got a set-back yesterday at the hands of Judge Butler in the United States District Court. Andrew W. Glessner, a boy of fifteen, was on trial for sending objectionable literature through the mails, and when the evidence for the government was all in, Judge Butler said that he thought the boy had been sufficiently punished, as he had been in jail. The extreme youth of the lad and the disgrace he had already suffered was sufficient, the court thought, to justify the district attorney in abandoning the case. District Attorney Valentine concurred in these views, and the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty.

"Comstock, who had entrapped the lad by means of a decoy letter, quickly spoke up and said that his society should be justified in its efforts to suppress the circulation of vicious literature.

"Judge Butler, in his mild and dignified manner, replied that the society had been justified; that it was a praiseworthy institution; that it should be commended for the work it was engaged in, for it was doing good.

"These encomiums, however, did not seem to satisfy the exacting New Yorker, and he further persisted in his demands for what he called justification.

"Judge Butler eyed him for a moment, and then said: 'You hav a great deal to learn. Take care that your society does not become the agent of persecution instead of prosecution. Notwithstanding your references, you are not too old to learn discretion.'

"There was a faint attempt to applaud the judge as Mr. Comstock, considerably subdued, made his way out of court."

Commenting upon this case, the New York Telegram givs further particulars of how Anthony got the boy into his toils. It says:

"Philadelphia is to be congratulated upon possessing a judge endowed with common sense and bravery enough to oppose the officiousness of that impertinent intermeddler, Anthony Comstock. While Mr. Comstock has, without doubt, done good in suppressing the publication of infamous books and pictures, there is reason to believe that he has been the cause of injustice and suffering to persons whose offenses at most were venial when compared with the coldly-calculated crimes of professional culprits. Recently a boy named Glessner was on trial in the United States District Court, at Philadelphia, charged with sending indecent poetry through the mail. The package was opened by one of the postmasters to find whether its contents were first-class or third-class. Mr. Comstock, on being notified of the nature of the contents, is said to hav written to Glessner, inclosing one dollar, for more copies. The copies were not sent, but in an interview of Comstock with the boy the latter admitted his offense. Hence the prosecution. At Judge Butler's instance—the judge above referred to—the district attorney did not press for a verdict of guilty, and the boy was acquitted. Mr. Comstock, who was evidently much excited, had the impudence to attempt to make a speech, when Judge Butler very properly remarked: 'You hav a great deal to learn. Take care that your society does not become the agent of persecution instead of prosecution. Notwithstanding your references, you are not too old to learn discretion.' The rebuke was so well deserved and so aptly uttered that it should be scattered far and wide. These Philadelphia judges sometimes set a fine example to our own. Comstock had better steer clear of them, and be more cautious in this state, too."

The Herald givs him this counsel:

"Mr. Anthony Comstock would do well to ponder the advice given him by a Pennsylvania judge recently, to take care that his society does not become the agent of persecution instead of prosecution. The great public hates certain forms of vice as heartily as Mr. Comstock or any of his friends can do, but it looks suspiciously on all officious intermeddling."

Notice.

FRIENDS OF THE LIBERAL CAUSE IN ILLINOIS: Please let me appeal to you once more to take hold with me to make the National Liberal League movement a permanent success in the state of Illinois by planting a tree of liberty in this state under the charter recently granted by the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League for the state Liberal League of Illinois.

Let us all unite to make this a tree of strong and thrifty growth, under the cooling shade of the branches of which we may find a sweet repose from the taunts and jeers of the believers in superstitious dogmas, and whose roots, in the form of local auxiliary Leagues and memberships to the state League, shall permeate every part of this rich prairie state.

I hav now the names of twenty gentlemen and six ladies as charter-members to the Illinois state League. This number ought to be multiplied by ten between this and the time of organizing the League.

The convention to complete the organization of the Illinois state League will be held in Farmer City, DeWitt county, Ill., on the 11th and 12th of June, 1881. There are expenses attendant upon the holding of this convention that must be met, and although I am freely giving my whole time and attention to the Liberal cause, yet I am financially a poor man and hardly able to bear all the expenses I am put to in the work. And I hav too much faith in the true principles of Liberalism implanted in the hearts of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to think that they are willing to let me bear this whole burden alone. I am trying to arrange for a reduction of fare to those wishing to attend the convention on all lines of the Illinois Central Railroad. And I am in correspondence with some of our best Liberal lecturers and speakers to be on hand to address the meeting.

Now, my Liberal friends, what say you? Will you let me hear from you by sending me a little aid to help me in carrying on this work, either as a life membership to the state League at a fee of one dollar each or as a donation to the cause?

My post-office address from this time on until after holding the state League convention will be Springfield, Ill.

Science vs. Religion.

Editor News Letter, Dear Sir: I hope you will be so kind as to accord me a place in your paper for a synopsis of a lecture delivered before a large congregation at the Serio-Comic Institute of Oakland, on last Sabbath. The meeting was presided over by a worthy ex-mayor of your city, who offered up a characteristic prayer, learned when he was president of your board of supervisors. The talented speaker said: My Many and Faithful Hearers: It is with unspeakable sadness that I am called upon to announce the presence of a dangerous Infidel element in our midst. He is delivering a course of lectures, which if believed in will overturn our Rock of Ages, and cast adrift the fast-anchored hopes of millions. He is a scientist, and his name is Denton. He is a representativ type of a large class of men who hav dug among rocks, paddled about in the mud, caught bugs, butterflies, and beetles, hunted snakes, snails, and slugs; bored holes in the earth, counted the rings around the big trees, rooted up old stumps, and prowling around nature's old junk-shops, poking his fingers in all the nooks and corners of the hidden ages; shaking, with ruthless hand, the dust from off the cast-off clothing of the buried centuries. He has classified all that he had not found under the head of ologies. He has grouped all of the incomprehensible under the name of science, and now stands up to tell you what he don't know. My Christian friends, don't listen to him. He has started a rival deity, with a creation older than ours. It took his God millions of centuries to bring man and his dwelling-place up to their present condition, while our God created the earth and everything it contains in a week, and had Sunday left to himself. This man throws mud at our ancestors. He wishes to destroy our beautiful Eden. Look at grandfather Adam in the undress uniform of nature's noblemen. Think of grandmother Eve arrayed in the lovely simplicity of her natural hair, and compare them with Mr. Denton's account of our origin. He says our grandfather was an oyster, and our grandmother a clam; and our uncles, and aunts, and all our wives' relations, were grub-worms from the oozy fens of Asia. Suppose all Mr. Denton says is true, we don't want to hear it. We hav made a God of our own, after our own image. He suits us. He made a world in just the time we laid out for him, six days, and that just suits us also. We hav built up a scheme of salvation with millions in it, and we don't want it pulled down by any man who hunts after crawfish and buzzards. Mr. Denton tells us a man's skull was half an inch thick in the stone age. We don't care if it was a foot thick. It is what's in the skulls of to-day that interests us. We don't care how long it took to make a corner lot; it's what it will bring per front that we are interested in. We hav all we want. We hav a God, a Bible, a religion, and many temples of worship, and six hundred million dollars of church property in the United States, for which we never gave in value the equivalent of one dollar, and we don't want to be disturbed. Don't listen to the man Denton, my friends; he may be right, but we don't want to know it. We, the clergy, will take care of your souls, and you take care of us. You are just ignorant enough to believe in us and be happy. Keep so. Don't learn anything; some of you know too much now. What do we want to know of the glacial period, of the tertiary period, of the stone age, or the age of bronze? Nothing. What we want to keep ourselvs posted on is the Golden Age, the age of steam, of electricity; we are interested in railroads, in commerce, in art, in everything that makes us comfortable here, and leaves us money enough to purchase a lazy hereafter. Believe in me, my friends. Don't learn anything. Don't think. The less you know the nearer you are to heaven. And ignorance always finds its home and refuge in the deity. We hav a divine providence whose sleepless eye watches over us. He buries us beneath the lava, he shakes us out of the world by earthquakes, drowns us in floods, blasts us with epidemics, has us shot down in the streets, and packs a jury to acquit our murderers. What more do we want? Nothing. It is all the work of the deity we hav created, and his will be done. Amen.

Cursed be the scientific worm
Who doubts the book of Moses,
And thinks man's intellectual germ
In mud and rock reposes.

The Oaks, April, 1881. THE PARSON.

HE that ordained the Sabbath ordained it for man's sake, and not contrariwise—man because of the Sabbath day. It is meet, therefore, that the keeping of the Sabbath day giv place to the commodity and profit of man.—Erasmus, (1467—1536).

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Fourteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I had fancied that the Infidelity of to-day, at least among intelligent and well-read people, was very different from what your last letter inclined me to believe. I had supposed that the abrupt and rather coarse style of Mr. Paine had become unpopular—that a man was no longer branded as a hypocrite or thought to be a "ninny" if he professed to believe the scriptures. I had even thought that as far as external conventionalities are concerned, an Atheist might admit that the ordinary Christian possessed some good qualities, and might treat his creed with that politeness which one man accords to another's opinions in all polite society, and that even in debate with him he would not be betrayed into acrimony. Mr. Greg in his "Creed of Christendom," Mr. Newman (if he indeed is the author) in his "Supernatural Religion," and Prof. Tyndall, Mr. Darwin, Mr. Wallace, and other well-known scientists have stated their objections to the teachings of Christendom (which they have too often confounded with the teachings of Christ), and even his teachings itself, in language dignified, learned and calculated to convey all the force of their thoughts without anything that would unnecessarily wound the sensibilities—to call it that—of those who differ with them. But I find that I was mistaken, and that the warning which he who was crucified eighteen hundred years ago in Jerusalem gave to his disciples is as true to-day as they were then—"Ye shall all be hated of all men for my name's sake."

I scarcely need remind the reader that very little in your last letter is of any weight as argument or proof. One may inflame themselves into a state wherein they are for the time incapable of correct judgment by allowing their minds to become prejudiced to one view of things. The sufferings of the human race is indeed a subject over which the man of feeling and reflection must shudder. But it is in the most horrible instances you enumerate. God has not interfered in these instances to prevent them, it is true, but if he had invariably stricken the offender down you would have used it to represent him as cruel and vindictive. But your argument does not prove that Jehovah is the being you picture him because it is against the existence of any omnipotent and omniscient being in the universe.

> "Man's inhumanity to man > Makes countless thousands mourn."

There is, however, very little that I can take up in your letter to argue. In fact, I feel discouraged at your methods, for they are far from being upright, honest objections to the scriptures. I might very readily allow many, many of them, and yet, notwithstanding, the divine origin of the scriptures would not be disproved in the slightest. Thus you constantly refer to the failings and sins of professed Christians. Now I admit, to a great extent, all you can say on this point; but proving that Christendom is a vile, corrupt mass of hypocritical profession does not militate against the truth of the scripture; nay, it rather confirms the prescience of him who inspired Paul to write, "Know, also, that in the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (2 Tim. iii). And even more closely does it predict that awful system which arrogates to itself the title of "the church," with its traffic in indulgences, its worship of the saints, its enforced celibacy, and its anathema on those who eat meat upon its fast days: "The spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats" (1 Tim. iv, 1–3).

Again you insist upon your own conclusions as to the origin of sin against the express declaration of scripture while professing to criticise from a scriptural standpoint. Now the scriptures assert that God is not the author of sin; you insist that he is. I believe the scripture, and I affirm that when you picture a being who deliberately creates men to damn them, a God who makes men sin, you slander the character of Jehovah. There are no words sufficiently strong to reprobate the belief of men in such a being, but the scriptures teach no such doctrine. But you reply that your reason leads you to believe that if there is an omnipotent and omniscient God in the universe, he must be the author of sin. Is it so that you will not admit that your reason may lead you astray in some matters? You cannot give a satisfactory explanation of the existence of moral evil in the world, yet you admit it is here. Why will not your reason help you in this particular? Refer to the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of the book of Job, and let your reason attempt to answer the questions of Jehovah, asked in those chapters. Can it? In fact, do you not acknowledge that all you know is as the comparison of a grain of sand to the sea-shore as compared with what you do not? Then realize the folly of using human logic to plumb depths that are unfathomable—self-evidently so.

What sort of reason is it that denies to the creator the right to take away the breath he gave at his pleasure? Or is God the only one who should not do as he would with his own? O my friend, what spirit has come over you that leads you to reject the scriptures on such grounds as these?

You allege that nine-tenths of the Christians you have met believe that God has the body and organs of a man. Are you serious, or do you jest? I have met a great many Christians, but I have never met one who believed this. Can you name a minister who has ever preached such a superstitious idea? Most assuredly the Bible teaches nothing of the kind. It is a great pity you did not glance at a commentator to get the Christian understanding of the truth that God made man in his own image. That I may not seem to give you merely my opinion, let me quote to you from the commentator, Scott, "The image of God, in which Adam was created, consisted in an understanding prepared to imbibe true knowledge; a judgment free from corrupt bias; a will disposed to obedience, and affections regulated according to reason and truth; nor can we conceive that it should consist in anything else." Nor did the ancient, nor do the modern, Jews believe that God has corporal parts. Possibly some of the more ignorant among the papists believe that he has, but I even doubt this. But the scriptures teach that God is a spirit, without parts, eternal, infinite, independent, omnipotent, omniscient, and immutable. Where they speak of his face, his eyes, his ears, his nose and nostrils, etc., it is a figurative manner, as Dr. Gill observes, of denoting his sight and presence, his favor and good will, etc., by face; his omniscience and all-seeing providence by eyes; his readiness to attend and answer prayer by ears; his acceptance, or non-acceptance, of persons and sacrifices by nose and nostrils, etc., etc. Nor will the fact that a divine person appeared to Abraham, Jacob, and others in the Old Testament in the form of a man avail your argument anything, for that person, according to the teachings of scripture, was Christ, and no one had ever seen God or heard his voice before Christ. But how thoroughly disingenuous it is to charge the Bible with anthropomorphism when the very scientists for whose teachings you have so great a respect lie under the same imputation! For a full proof of this see the fifth chapter of the Duke of Argyll's new work, "The Unity of Nature," now appearing serially in the Contemporary Review—even detecting it in one of the most carefully prepared speeches of Prof. Tyndall, and absurdly enough it may even, he says, "be observed running throughout the language which is commonly employed to condemn anthropomorphism and the supernatural."

With these few words I shall close. I am not very fond of repetition or verbosity, and I am not afraid to leave it to the reader to decide for himself on which side the weakness and want of truth lies.

Very truly yours, G. M. MAIR.

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE VIRGIN MARY.—CONTINUED.

Again, at the wedding feast, Mary did but say to her arrogant, impudent godson, "They have no wine," when he snappishly retorted, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" He might as well have said, "Mind your own business, old woman; I know what I am about." What does our reverend doctor of a divinity say about it? "Plainly and in the most emphatic manner, Christ refuses to recognize Mary as intercessor or director," as if that were proof of his divinity and she not the mother of God! Yes, because he rebuked her simply for stating the fact that there was no wine.

Notwithstanding this snubbing by her truant son of God, the Virgin Mary continued to bustle about and give advice, until this amiable youth had turned over one hundred and twenty gallons of good water into wine. What a sacrament was that! Did the guests drink it all? If so, they must have been a numerous party, or else they would have been as drunk as the patriarchs of old—deluge Noah and righteous Lot.

Poor Mary seems to have had a hard lot, for both of these scenes were in public, and could not have escaped the mention of the bystanders, even if Mary had whispered in the ear of her pugnacious son, "They have no wine." But she was destined to a third rebuff more mortifying to a mother than either of the preceding. It can best be given in the Rev. Fulton's own classic language: "A third instance is still more marked. Jesus is talking to an immense multitude, and is making a hand-to-hand fight with Pharisees and scribes. While he yet talked to the people, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him. Evidently Mary had no idea of the character or the mission of the man Christ Jesus, but feeling that he was popular, she was glad to exhibit her relationship in a public manner, and so through the throng sent in word saying, 'Tell Jesus his mother and his brethren stand without desiring to speak with him.' But he answered and said unto him that told him, 'Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?' . . . The Lord of glory (saucy young Hebrew) withstood the influence of Mary (his mother), rebuked her intermeddling and dictation, and stood forth to his work in the declaration as he stretched out his hand toward his disciples, and said, 'Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my father who is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.'

"It is surprising that after Mary had been rebuked at Cana of Galilee she should have presumed to have interrupted Jesus in the presence of the multitude. . . . It was unworthy of Mary to ignore the divine origin of Jesus, and call Joseph his father before the elders. She thought to raise herself by lowering him. He would not be lowered. By his mother and by the world he knew that he had a right to be recognized as the son of God. . . . . Mary was tempted to place herself above Christ, above her son."

There are three points here to be considered, good manners, filial duty, and the divine example set for us miserable sinners. Permit the ungodly woman to put her construction of this account, "who is my mother," on record by the side of these learned commentators and doctors of divinity. She has the same right to "suppose" and "infer" as have they. "Suppose" then, that she "infers" that Mary, hearing one day that Jesus was holding forth in Galilee, takes the three eldest boys, James, Joses, and Juda and one of the girls, leaving the other girl at home with Simon, to take care of the baby, and starts off to hear the son and brother evangelist preacher. This is not improbable, as Mark asks (vi, 3), "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James and Joses, and of Juda and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us?" And Luke asks (iv, 22), "Is not this Joseph's son?" The scene of Jesus's labors are not so far distant but what they think they can go and return before dinner, if they hasten. They know no reason why they should not go out and hear him as well as all the country round about, though his father, Joseph, and some of his brothers did not believe in him (John vii, 5,) and thought he ought to be at work at his trade rather than roaming around teaching heresy and disputing with the clerical professors. Mary could not see how, when troops of women were following him from place to place and admiring him, it could be out of character for his mother to be caught in the crowd, neither can any other sensible person, though Justin D. Fulton (reverend) thinks she ought to have been at home attending to her domestic affairs, but he has no rebuke for any other woman tramping over the country after him or with him. Well, Mary tells the children that while their father is at work at his trade that forenoon, after getting his dinner all prepared so that little Salome can attend to it, they will run out and hear one of Jesus's famous sermons, for the first time, as he is so near by, and invite him home. So she puts the roast in the oven, lays the table, and prepares everything for an immediate meal on her return; but before kissing little Salome and telling her to take good care of the baby and setting off, she—thinking Jesus may be obstinate and will not return, and remembering he has been gone several weeks and took no change of apparel, and this being before the days of reversible collars—takes a new suit of clothes, a clean shirt, a tidy pair of mended socks, a pair of new sandals, and other little niceties so essential to the wardrobe of a young bachelor preacher who has to stand before multitudes expatiating on "the kingdom come," to say nothing about the young blushing Judean damsels, Mary and Martha, and others. So they get off as early as possible, packing a basket with goody-goodies for Jesus. The mother's heart is dancing for joy as she trips along with her children, chatting of the sweet surprise in store for Jesus. By and by they heave in sight of a multitude outside of a house. Quickening their steps they hear the sound of Jesus's voice. Approaching nearer they plainly distinguish, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. xii, 37). More and more animated they hurry on, but as they arrive at the outermost border of the crowd they find Jesus is within doors sowing the good seed of eternal life. They cannot come at him "for the press," and he cannot see them for the crowd. They stand, after their long, wearisome walk, patiently waiting for him to close, but no "amen" yet. He is on one of his long-winded harangues with the scribes and Pharisees, a regular three-chapter-sermon-on-the-Mount discourse. Despairing of seeing him, and realizing the condition of things at home, Joe's return and no dinner, no Mary to greet him, and his ill temper, her duty to her son, husband, and family conflicting, Mary hesitates, but having come so far she really desires to "see Jesus." He was not in the best of moods when he left home, having said several impudent things to his mother as usual when she undertook to give him good advice. But with her patience tried and her time more than exhausted, she at last ventures to send up to him the words of the text, "Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee." When the message is received this son of God blurts out before that vast multitude, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?" Then he stretches forth his hand toward his disciples and adds, "Behold my mother and my brethren, for whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, and my mother."

Oh, Mary, poor Mary! How her heart sank within her! Her lip quivered, her eyes filled with tears, as she whispered to James: "It is no use, he disowns us; he is ashamed of us. We might as well go home. He calls these strange men and women that he has picked up in his travels his brethren, sisters, and mothers in preference to us, and says they do the will of God, his father, and we do not. What more could I have done? Here are baked pigeons in the basket, half a dozen turnovers, of which he is so fond, a lot of pickles, some of our best jelly, and all the grape wine, which I made for sickness, that he left over when he had his last party of wine-bibbers; yes, everything good that we have robbed ourselves of at home for him," and she sobbed aloud. As she felt the weight of the heavy bundle under her arm that she had tugged, by turns with the children, all the long way in the hot sun, and thought of her ungrateful son, she burst into tears. James sought to soothe his mother, while the girl, seeing her distress, frightened, clung to her skirts, begging to go home. As she dried her tears and hushed her sobs, she heard Jesus shout, "If a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand" (Mark iii, 25). Thinking this was intended purposely for her, poor Mary's tears flowed afresh, and she attempted to retire at once; but Joses, who had the basket, pulled her by the sleeve, with the suggestion (he was very ragged, and did not dare go himself) not to carry the things back, but to hand them to some one and so pass them on to brother Jesus, whom he really loved, if he did ignore the family. The grieved woman, with a heavy heart, acceded to this proposal, and the basket and bundles were given to those nearest to them to be passed along to Jesus, and the sad, disappointed mother, without catching one glimpse of her God-begotten, Holy Ghost, immaculate-conception son, turned with a despairing heart, and retraced her footsteps homeward, the echo of the last words of the godly preacher ringing in her mother ears: "He that loveth father and mother more than me is not worthy of me. If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." This was a true statement, as 1,500 years of bloody Christianity testify.

Matthew informs us that the same day Jesus went out into a ship and gave his famous parable of "The Sower and his Seed." Doubtless he and his disciples had a good lunch from the aforesaid basket, and Jesus sported in clean linen, perhaps throwing into the sea the discarded suit that Mary would have gladly taken back and laundried for the disobedient, misguided son.

Let us follow the virgin, disappointed and disheartened, hurrying along with all speed, reaching home to find it long past the dinner hour, the children there left nowhere to be found, for Joe, on returning for his dinner, was very angry because Mary had not asked him if she might go to meeting that forenoon. It will be remembered she was an adept at concealing (for proof, see the Holy Ghost visitation secret), and Joseph had had no angel dream of information while at work that day. Enraged at this deception, he had taken the children over to Mary's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleopas, so the "ever blessed virgin," tired as she was, had to trudge over there after them. The boys were as cross as cross could be, and when the reputed father of "our blessed savior" came in from his daily toil that night, the "mother of God" had a—no, not a curtain lecture, but a lecture without a curtain.

This, it may be supposed, cured Mary of running round after her tramp of a son, so ever afterward she probably stayed at home and attended to her household duties, as Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D.D., says women ought, and let Martha, the other Marys, and the fresh, young damsels of Judea minister to the wants of her dutiful, gentlemanly son Jesus. This, we infer, is the reason why the veil was not again removed from Mary, she never appearing again in public or in print until her son suffered martyrdom; then it appears that the mother's heart overcame all obstacles and reflections, and she dared to hover near with the other Marys.

Jesus seems to have been somewhat mollified in his feelings toward her while hanging on the cross, for when he saw her standing by, according to John (no other writer records it), "He saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son!" (referring to John). Then said he to the disciple, John, "Behold thy mother!" And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home. She is mentioned but once afterward in holy writ. The divines before referred to boastingly assert, "To a woman was this honor given to be the first that saw the risen redeemer, and that woman was not his mother." Strange that he should not have appeared before his ascension unto his mother, who had suffered and borne so much for him. But not one word of hope or encouragement, not one statement in regard to her innocence relative to his immaculate birth, did he leave on record to substantiate his claims to divinity or equality with God. "Medieval imagination has supposed [see Smith's Bible Dictionary], but scripture does not state, that her son appeared to Mary after his resurrection from the dead." She was doubtless living at Jerusalem with John, cherished with the tenderness which her tender soul would have especially needed, and which undoubtedly she found preëminently in St. John. We have no record of her presence at the ascension, or at the descent of the holy spirit on the day of Pentecost. What we do read of her is that she remained steadfast in prayer in the upper room at Jerusalem with Mary Magdalene and Salome, and those known as the Lord's brothers and the apostles. (Acts i, 14).

This is the last view we have of her. Holy scripture leaves her engaged in prayer. It is probable that the rest of her life was spent in Jerusalem with St. John. According to one tradition, the beloved disciple would not leave Palestine until she had expired in his arms. Other traditions make her journey with St. John to Ephesus, and there die in extreme old age. What indefiniteness in regard to the virgin mother of God!

The limits of these articles will not permit the theological discussion of the character, nature, and worship of Mary. Volumes would not suffice to do the latter justice, so numerous have been the opinions, synods, and controversies relative to her true position in connection with the glorious scheme of salvation. Yet our review of this most noted woman will be incomplete without stating in brief the cultus of the blessed virgin. Ecclesiastical history informs us that the worship of Mary was wholly external to the church, and considered as fabulous and heretical, being confined to the Gnostics and Collyridians until the sixth century, when it began to spread within the church. It received a stunning blow by the Reformation, but recovered, and increased, until all devout Catholics worship Mary as the mother of God. Moreover, the ecumenical council, in 1854, established the long-disputed dogma of the immaculate conception of the virgin Mary. Her continued virginity is also maintained, notwithstanding the affirmation interrogatively, "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren James and Joses, and Simon and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" (Matt. xiii, 55, 56).

This query proves, at least, the then existence of four brothers and two sisters of Jesus; but in the face of this record the divines have the audacity to suppose these were not the brothers and sisters of "our blessed Lord," but only his cousins, and the sons and daughters of Mary's sister Mary, the wife of Cleopas, which gives them a chance to again suppose that Jesus might have been the only child of Mary, therefore she was not only a virgin before his birth, but continued so to the end of her life. Many Protestant divines are averse to this latter interpretation, while others are still undecided. No certainty, it will be seen, exists to-day in regard to these several points, and many others equally essential, and which have disturbed and savagely divided the Christian world ever since the followers of Jesus, it is said, "were first called Christians at Antioch."

A German-American Lecturer.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

I am glad to see that you hav printed my communication on "Nativism and Knownothingism," which I sent you a short time ago.

There are four classes of men in the United States whose notions I utterly dislike and reject. Those men are the snobs, bigots, Knownothings, and monopolists of this country.

I hav prepared an elaborate lecture on "Woman Suffrage," which latter I oppose not in theory but in practice. We hav in this civilized country two distinct institutions which require to be ruled, namely, the state and the family. By natural law the former must be ruled by the men and the latter by the women. The men are not able to rule their households. If, therefore, the women would rule both the state and family they would wield more power in this free country than the men, and thus violate the leading principle of American freedom, namely, the principle of equal rights to all, in all matters of public concern. This is the main argument of the lecture.

If there are clubs or other associations in the Western states that wish me to deliver the lecture before them (in English, of course), I am ready and willing to serve them at any time.

All About Thomas Paine.

The Washington Post of May 11th published what it called "A Literary Find," being a manuscript memorial of Thomas Paine to Congress, Feb. 14, 1808. But the said memorial was published long ago, together with two others about the same time and relating to the same matter, all of which may be found in Vol. II. of Paine's Political Works. A brief statement of the case will be quite interesting just now.

In 1785 Paine petitioned the Continental Congress to make up for the deficiency of his salary as secretary to the Committee for Foreign Affairs in 1778 and 1779. The nominal salary was $800, but in consequence of the depreciation of the Continental money he really got only about one-fifth of that sum per annum. The congress of 1785 accordingly passed a resolution to giv him $3,000, but the resolution recited as the consideration "the early, unsolicited, and continued labors of Mr. Thomas Paine in explaining and enforcing the principles of the late Revolution, by ingenious and timely publications upon the nature of liberty and civil government."

Now it has been assumed by everybody, and even asserted by the committee in 1808, that Paine got this $3,000 in Oct., 1785. But that he did not get it I think most clearly appears from his subsequent memorials to Congress. In that of Jan. 21, 1808, he says:

"There is a resolve of the old Congress, while they sat in New York, of a grant to me of $3,000. The resolve is put in handsome language, but it has relation to a matter which it does not express. . . If Congress should judge proper to refer this memorial to a committee, I will inform that committee of the particulars of it. I hav also to state that the authority of the old Congress was become so reduced toward the latter end of the war as to be unable to hold the states together. Congress could do no more than recommend, of which the states frequently took no notice, and when they did, it was never uniformly. . . . In a communication afterward with Gov. Clinton of New York, now Vice-President, it was judged that for the purpose of my going fully into the subject, and to prevent any misconception of my motiv or object, it would be best that I receive nothing from Congress, but leave it to the states, individually, to make what acknowledgment they pleased. The state of New York made me a present of a farm, which, since my return to America, I hav found it necessary to sell [but which he had to take back]; and the state of Pennsylvania voted me five hundred pounds, their currency, but none of the states to the eastward of New York, nor to the south of Philadelphia, ever made me the least acknowledgment."

In the same memorial, speaking of his political publications, he says, "As they were works done from principle I cannot dishonor that principle by asking any reward for them." But what he petitioned for in 1808 was payment for services as secretary to Col. Laurens in 1781, accompanying and aiding him in obtaining help from France. Col. Laurens at first wished to decline the mission and hav Col. Hamilton sent, but Congress refused. Then says Paine, who was the originator of the project:

"Col. Laurens then came to state the case to me. He said he was enough acquainted with the military difficulties of the army, but that he was not enough acquainted with political affairs, nor with the resources of the country, 'but,' said he, 'if you will go with me I will accept,' which I agreed to do and did do."

The result of that mission was a present from France of $1,200,000, and a loan of $2,000,000, which enabled the combined Continental and French armies to defeat Cornwallis at Yorktown.

The success of the mission was due to the diplomatic tactics of Thomas Paine. For more than two months the formalities of court and the self-complacency of the minister baffled the diplomatic tutor. The French minister said, "I am confounded with your audacity." But there comes a public levee. Louis XVI. is there, and so is young Laurens, in uniform, his sword by his side. He is presented to the king, who only expects the passing formalities of an introduction. But Laurens speaks: "I am just from the army of Washington; I know well its condition; it is fully set forth in this memorial. Unless speedy succor is sent to my country this weapon I now wear might be drawn as the subject of Great Britain against you and France." The king was struck dumb, but soon rallied and made a favorable reply. Laurens and Paine returned with the money which broke the power of Great Britian, and achieved the independence of the United States of America. For this service Paine never received a penny. He left no heirs to claim compensation, but some day this country will do justice to the great "Author-hero of the Revolution."

Discussion.

Our Fifteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: Permit me to say I think your last letter the weakest you have written. I cannot see that you have answered a single one of my arguments, and I think that there was at least some reasoning in my last. In place of meeting my arguments you assume the air of injured innocence and represent that I have been coarse, unfair, and dishonest, on which account you profess to be discouraged with me. I cannot do otherwise than think you wrong in this position, as I conceive you to be in many others you occupy. If I have seemed a little rough in speaking of the God you would have me accept as a being of infinite perfection, I have not perverted the record, I have not misrepresented the doctrines of Christians and the Bible, and if I have apparently been a trifle coarse, I have not exhibited a tithe of the coarseness of your God and the theological system of belief.

You seem to accuse me with not having due respect for the religious opinions of my opponent. Possibly I have not. I am so thoroughly convinced the theological system is all wrong that I may very likely be guilty of not paying so much deference to it as those who, like yourself, admire it and regard it as divine truth. But I have seen no indications on your part that you entertain a very lively respect for the opinions of those who do not accept your views. I have not perceived that you treat the belief of Buddhists, Mohammedans, or Infidels with special "politeness." Nor has it been characteristic of your brother Christians for the past fifteen hundred years to be extremely "polite" to the millions of unbelievers and heretics whom they have put to death in the most cruel and agonizing manner. Neither did John Calvin, your patron saint and the father of the system of theology to which you give adhesion, show very marked "politeness" to the opinion of Michael Servetus, whom he caused to be burnt to death by a slow, green oak-wood fire, for not holding such views about God as Calvin decided he should hold. It was hardly the most approved variety of "politeness" that moved Calvin to write these words to the Marquis de Pauel: "Do not hesitate to rid the country of those fanatical fellows [faquins] who in their conversation seek to excite the people against us, who blacken our conduct, and would fain make our belief pass as a revery. Such monsters ought to be strangled as I did in the execution of Michael Servetus." It was not an admirable kind of politeness that caused him at an earlier date to write to his theological tool, Farel, about this same unfortunate Servetus, whose blood Calvin had been thirsting for for seven years. Calvin wrote thus: "If he [Servetus] come here [to Geneva] and my authority be considered, he shall not escape with his life."

When after Servetus had lain in a filthy prison and had become a victim of disease and was devoured by vermin, and he wrote a letter to the council stating his doleful situation and begging for a change of linen, and when the council were disposed to grant this reasonable request, was it politeness and Christian mercy that moved Calvin to oppose it and to issue the ukase that no change of linen should be furnished? When the unfortunate physician begged for counsel to defend him on his trial, and that the charges made against him should be read, was it politeness that made Calvin refuse this very reasonable request? When on the morning of the execution Servetus sent for Calvin and begged his pardon if he had done aught to offend his highness, was it Christian politeness that caused Calvin to spurn him and treat him with cold-hearted cruelty? Did Calvin show a disposition through the arrest, incarceration, trial, and execution of this noble man to treat his victim in a manner not "to unnecessarily wound his sensibilities?" Have I done anything half so bad as the man you greatly admire and whom you believe possessed the true spirit of Christianity?

It seems illogical for you to quote in this connection the accredited words of Jesus, "Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." What has that to do with the discussion between you and me? Which has been the most powerful and oppressive system of religion in the world? Which has caused the most suffering, inflicted the most pain, shed the most blood, and caused the most death to maintain its power? Christianity! Who are the rich, the powerful, the tyrannical on earth to-day? Who are the most popular, fashionable, favored, and oppressive at this moment in our own country? Who are the most intolerant and ungenerous as to the opinions of those who differ from them and venture to oppose their favorite creed? Christians! I know of what I speak. I have been sent to prison by Christians for opinion's sake, and Christians have done their utmost to ruin me, if not to take my life. How absurd, then, for you to quote the words attributed to Jesus about being hated of all men for his sake! You belong to the ruling class; you belong to the favored class; it is popular in our country to be a Christian and to join in the song of Moses and the Lamb. Position, distinction, and wealth are obtained by being a Christian, or even by pretending to subscribe to its dogmas.

It has even been held out to your humble servant that he could make ten dollars where he now makes one if he would only turn and profess Christianity and join the popular crowd. Men have confessed to me that they joined the church and subscribed to its creed to help them in business and to help them in society. More than one has told me that should they avow Infidel sentiments and Infidel views they would lose their trade and their standing in society. You are quite mistaken as to whose "name's sake" brings odium and unpopularity. It is the naturalist, the adorer of nature, the unbeliever in supernaturalism, the Infidel, the man who denies the claims of Christianity, that is despised, spurned, and oppressed. There are thousands of Christians in this city and country who hate me with intense hatred, who would hardly recognize me as a man possessing rights equal to their own, who would scarcely give me a crust of bread to save my life were I in a starving condition; and many of whom have said I "ought to be imprisoned for life," or that I "ought to be burnt at the stake" because I presume to speak my honest convictions. Within the past week I saw a letter from a Christian that Ingersoll ought to be prohibited by force from teaching Infidelity. And all over this country men are being tabooed, despised, and oppressed because they dare to think for themselves, and because they dare maintain their honest opinions, because they have the temerity to deny the claims of Christianity. Hundreds of men have been turned out of employment and have been left with their families to starve, just because they advocate the opinions I advocate and even because they read THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Since my last to you I have received a letter from a patron in the West stating that he had been at work eleven years for a professing Christian, and had given full satisfaction, which had often been expressed in the strongest terms. But one day not long ago this employer saw his employee have a TRUTH SEEKER in his hand. Said he, "Do you read that paper?" "Yes." "Do you take it?" "Yes." "Then I have no longer anything for you to do. I want no one to work for me who takes that paper." And the faithful servant was forced to relinquish his situation and seek some other way to find food for himself and his family. Such cases are numerous; I could count them up by hundreds. Many a mechanic, clerk, and employee has been turned out of a job wholly because he had the honesty to let his views be known, and all has been done to injure him possible, whereas had he the hypocrisy to pretend to believe, or even had he kept silent, his services would have been retained. No, no; it is the Infidel who is despised, it is the Infidel who is "hated of all men" for truth and reason's sake.

Possibly I ought to readily fall in with your views of a God who you say has made all things and all existence with the foreknowledge of just how they would act and what the result of everything would be, and think him infinite in mercy and love, but I cannot. I cannot help thinking that a being of infinite love and infinite power would get up a happier world than this. He would have made health catching instead of disease, and happiness the result of existence instead of misery. Suffering, sorrow, pain, agony, and death would not be the fate of every being born into the world. Misery and wretchedness would not be the rule and happiness the exception, and that of brief duration to be followed by an eternity of the acutest torture and suffering to trillions and quintillions of poor helpless human beings. I cannot believe that a being who has devised this, or created all with the full knowledge of what the result would be, is one of infinite love, mercy, and goodness; no, not even to please you. If that is love and mercy, far better would it have been had they never had an existence, for I cannot possibly conceive a more cruel monster. What avails it for you to talk of his love and goodness and mercy when proofs of his hatred and vengeance are on every hand and side, and we are assured they must continue forever? How erroneous, how false, to pretend that he is a being of kindness and goodness and beneficence when he has caused, directly or indirectly, the vast amount of wretchedness and misery which exist, and which, we are told, must exist to the latest moments of eternity! One who has been the source of this inconceivable aggregate of unhappiness cannot possibly be all mercy and love.

Despite all that you and the clergy can say in adulation of such a God the damning fact still stands prominently out that he made man as he is, and with the full knowledge that he would be as he is. How absurd, then, to excuse him for the existence of sin and blame man for its existence. Man is not responsible for his own existence, nor for anything that has existence. God is responsible for all, when he planned all, executed all, and foreknew all. When God made man he knew he would sin, and hence is responsible for sin. All the prevarication and special pleadings of a million priests cannot efface this great truth, if there is truth in theology. Then how unjust to blame man for the existence of sin when he knew nothing of the nature of sin; did nothing toward planing it, nothing toward producing it, and did nothing with regard to anything save to act out the disposition and characteristics his maker had given him, who knew exactly what his creature would do long before he made him! For God or any other being to blame man for the existence of sin is worse than for the wolf of the fable to blame the lamb for roiling or disturbing the stream of water far above him, and which was utterly out of the power for the lamb to do. Life is the stream, man is the lamb, and God is the wolf.

If evil exists and theology is true it is because God wishes it to exist or because he is unable to prevent it. He knew long before he began his creation that evil would be the result, and now for thousands of years he has let this evil continue without making the slightest apparent effort to stop it; and yet you call him a merciful being and justify him for burning his creatures in hell forever for doing just what he made them to do. Surely a greater and more heartless monster was never conceived than Christians make their God to be.

Before closing this part of the argument I will quote the terse propositions said to have been laid down by Epicurus, who lived more than twenty-two hundred years ago. They have hardly been improved upon down to our time, and certainly the truth of these propositions has never been disproved.

1. Either God would remove evil out of this world, and cannot;
2. Or he can, and will not;
3. Or he has not the power nor will;
4. Or he has both the power and will.

1. If he has the will and not the power, this shows weakness, which is contrary to the nature of God.

2. If he has the power, and not the will, it is malignity; and this is no less contrary to his nature.

3. If he is neither able nor willing, he is both impotent and malignant, and consequently cannot be God.

4. If he is both willing and able (which alone is consonant to the nature of God), whence comes evil, or why does he not prevent it?

You may continue to adore such a God as this if you can see reason in doing so, but I cannot join you. Let me say here that I do not and cannot believe God such a monster as Jews and Christians have painted him. The gods of all nations have been the product of human creators and just what their makers have made them. Few or none of the gods have been better than their makers, but have resembled them in characteristics and disposition. The Jews and their God have been no exception to this general rule. Instead of God making man in his own image, man has made God in his image, and with commendable truth has it been said, "An honest God is the noblest work of man."

But unfortunately there has been far too much god-making in the world. The gods, or the belief in them, have done the world immensely more harm than good. They have been a curse to the human race. Man has brought curses upon himself by looking to God for help and blessings instead of to himself and to his fellow-men. There is not a particle of proof in nature or anywhere else that any god has an existence. Nature has no use for a god for her work; change or evolution moves in obedience to eternal, inherent, and innate laws, which act without a dictator or superintendent. A natural cause has existed for every result that has been produced and every event that has taken place. A god is not needed to make the sun to rise, the grass to grow, smoke to rise upward, and water to run down hill. A god is not needed to make twice two four, nor that an approving conscience shall be the result of good conduct, but he is needed for these just as much as for anything that takes place. Gods and devils are the most useless things that can be thought of.

The conception of these beings arose in the dark days of superstition, when the mind of man was in a crude, ignorant state. It is the greatest superstition that man has ever devised or become a slave to. The superstitious belief in gods has been the grand central superstition around which all other superstitions have clustered. The belief that God rules the world by the force of his absolute will has been the basis for all the despotism and tyranny that have existed in the world. Every king that has played the despot over his fellow-men has claimed to reign by the grace or permission of some god. God has been the authority not only for all the kingcraft in the world, but all the priestcraft as well. Every prophet, every dervish, every monk, every priest, and every bishop has claimed to act under his authority, in his name, and by his will. They have been the heavenly aristocracy which has cursed the earth They have been the oppressors that have crushed their poor, credulous fellow-beings into the dust. They have claimed to be arrayed in the livery of heaven and to speak by the authority of him who sits on the throne. For thousands of years these priests and prophets have kept up a tyranny of oppression on the earth most odious to every lover of freedom. The gods and their priests have done incalculable evil in the world. Men have paid far too much attention to the gods and not enough to themselves. Had they served God less and man more it would have been far better for them. Yes, the gods have been the source of tyranny among men, as "there can be no liberty on earth while man worships a tyrant in heaven."

Equally irrelevant is your longer quotation from Paul about "covetous boasters, proud, blasphemous," etc. I cannot see how it applies to the matters under discusssion. If you mean those terms have any special application to those who believe as I do, you are mistaken. Christians are as covetous, as boastful, as proud as any class of persons living, and the worst blasphemy in the world is to give the ruler of the universe such a character as your Bible and your creed give him. It is not irrational to conclude that it is the belief in such a God that makes them act so badly as they do.

It seems hardly worth while to occupy much space in further discussing the question with you as to whether the Bible teaches anthropomorphism. To my comprehension, it clearly teaches it in hundreds of places, and to say it does not makes the book a mass of unmeaning falsehoods. If God has no parts like a man, what sense or truth is there in ever talking about them? If he has no head, it is simply a lie to speak of his head. If he has no eye, it is nothing less than a lie to speak of his eye and of his seeing. If he has no nose, it is a lying absurdity to talk about his nose, his nostrils, and about smelling the savor of burnt grease and flesh offered up for his benefit. If he has no ear, how false to speak of his ear! If he has no arms or hands, how positively false to speak of his arm and his hand! There is no excuse for such falsehood. If he has no breast, no loins, how untruthful to represent that he has! If he has no legs, no knees, no feet, what falsity to even allude to them! If he has no back and no back parts, what lying to speak of them and to say that he showed them! If he had no parts and no body, it was simply grossly false to talk about his walking, his stretching forth his arm, his stamping with his feet, about smoke escaping from his nostrils, and fire and a sword from his mouth, and all that. The whole tenor of the old Bible is that God not only had body, parts, and form, but that he had the human passions of love, hatred, anger, revenge, fickleness, cunning, love of glory, etc., etc. If these things are not true of him, it is only positive falsehood that represents them to be so.

And how absurd for you to hold that I ought to take a commentary to understand what the Bible means! Am I to infer that the commentator is inspired to explain the Bible as the writers are supposed to have been inspired who penned it? Was Scott inspired when he attempted to make it out that when God formed man of clay, or of dust, and made him in his own form and image, it only meant the moral part and the ability to understand? What absurdity! There is not the slightest warrant or ground for making any such interpretation. The Bible story clearly meant the bodily form, shape, and image, and it is only sophistry and the sheerest twaddle to endeavor to make out to the contrary. If that old story means anything at all, it means that God rolled up some earth and gave it his own form and image, and breathed into its nostrils, and man became a living soul. The story relates to the body alone, and makes no allusion to the mental and moral powers. All there is of it is, Scott saw the absurdities of maintaining the idea of an infinite person or body, and endeavored, by a system of artful dodging and false reasoning, to evade the intent of the story. But the mass of those who read the old fable understand the descriptions of God giving him parts and organs just as the writers intended to convey it. And I am satisfied that a large majority of Christians to-day have an idea that God has a person, a body with parts and organs, and that he occupies some particular place in the universe at a given time. I am considerably older than yourself, and have had a much longer period in which to converse with my fellow-men upon this subject, and am fully convinced that the great bulk of people think of God as a person—a being with parts and organs. But let us compromise the matter, and agree that every man has the right to conceive or fix up his God just as he pleases —to regard his as a huge man, with a head, breast, arms, legs, feet, and back parts, or he can imagine an infinite presence, spirit, immateriality, or boundless nothing, according to his own fancy. It has been so for thousands of years; every man has made his god to suit himself, and probably no two persons to-day have precisely the same conception of God. They conceive according to their own powers of conception, and hence we have a great diversity of gods or opinions of God. Perhaps this is all right enough; those who pay their money ought to be allowed to take their choice.

Without caring a straw what the Duke of Argyll's new work says, let me ask you to tell me, if God is not anthropomorphic, how his son whom he begat was anthropomorphic and had all the parts and organs of a body that man has. If the son is anthropomorphic, how could he have been begotten by a sire who is not anthropomorphic? And do you not believe that the anthropomorphic son ascended up to heaven to set on the right hand of the Father? Then if you are correct about the non-anthropomorphism of the Father, is there not an endless incongruity and conflict in the godhead between anthropomorphism and non-anthropomorphism? But let us drop all this crude and absurd nonsense about gods and sons of gods for the present, and go on with the other parts of our discussion.

Let me say, however, before we leave the god question, that if there is a God, whether he has a body or has not a body, whether his is a substance of some kind, or is moonshine, or nothing at all, if he possesses a good strong intellect, and wished to convey intelligence of any kind to his ignorant creatures, it is very singular that he could not give them information in such a plain, straightforward manner as to meet their understanding, without employing priests and commentators to interpret and explain what he meant. It is a pity that he should ever be talking in metaphor and riddles, saying one thing when he meant another, talking about his parts and organs when he has none, and in various ways mystifying and befogging his unsophisticated readers.

JESUS AS A PHILOSOPHER AND SCIENTIST.

To return, then, from an extended digression, it devolves upon me first to show that "Jesus's teachings were defective in intelligence and scientific information, and so far as they are of value his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him." I do not think it will require much space to demonstrate this.

There is no indication that Jesus possessed unusual knowledge of a philosophical, literary, or scientific character. He did little or nothing toward explaining the laws of the universe or how the changes and evolutions of matter take place. He did not explain the phenomena of vegetable and animal life. He said nothing about the invisible physical forces which pervade the universe, such as electricity, magnetism, atomic attraction, chemical affinity, centrifugal, and centripetal force, the nature and composition of light, the correlation of forces, the nature of heat, the laws of mechanics—in short, nothing of the kind. There is not the first particle of proof that he knew anything of astronomy, cosmogony, paleontology, chemistry, geology, biology, psychology, ethnology, archeology, natural history, zoology, mineralogy, botany, ornithology, philology, geography, mathematics, optics, acoustics, meteorology, pneumatics, hydrostatics, or in fact of any of the sciences or branches of education. Even if he knew how to read and write it does not appear in the account given of him. In one incident given of him, which, however, I believe has been discarded by the new revisers, something is said about his writing in the sand with his finger or a stick, but so far as is known the writing amounted to nothing, and might have been crow-tracks or rude hieroglyphics.

He knew as little about the arts and the sciences. He seems to have had not the least knowledge of one of them. He also knew nothing of machinery or mechanical inventions. He taught his hearers nothing of the best modes of plowing the earth, sowing grains, planting seeds, harvesting crops, threshing them out, grinding grains, making bread, cooking meats and vegetables; nothing about the best means of preserving health, promoting longevity, constructing dwellings, felling timber, working it into lumber, or anything like that. He evidently knew nothing of the saw-mill, the planing-mill, the grist-mill, the carding-machine, the loom, the cotton gin, the printing-press, or even the simplest mechanical appliances.

Had he been the source of all knowledge, and if his mission in this world was to give mankind useful information, how much valuable practical knowledge he could have imparted to the world had he such knowledge to impart! What useful inventions he could have given to man had he the requisite knowledge and ability! How much good service he could have done the world had he taught the best modes of agriculture, how to improve the breeds of cattle, the best methods of educating children, useful mechanical inventions, the best plows, cultivators, hoes, rakes, mowing-machines, reapers, threshing-machines, farm-wagons, carriages, mills of all kinds, the circular saw, the planer, the shuttle, the steam-engine, steamboats, railroads, the printing-press, the telegraph, the telephone, and the thousands of other useful inventions and improvements which plodding man for two thousand years has been compelled to work out by his own powers, when this son of a God, if he was the son of a God, should easily have made it known when he was trying to benefit men by imparting to them the information they really stood in need of!

But he had little to say about what would have been useful to man in this life, little that would help to make this world better and happier, simply because he knew nothing about it. The most he did have to say was to haul over some of the absurd claims of Jewish mythology in what is called the "law of Moses;" to talk some about his father in heaven; to repeat some of the moral maxims and precepts that had been taught by the Essenes before him, and by the sages and teachers of several nations hundreds of years before he came into the world to deal somewhat in metaphysical vagaries and inanities, to cast out devils, to attribute to devils the diseases which afflict mankind, to talk in parables and blind riddles in such an obscure manner that for nearly two thousand years learned theologians and divines have been contending and fighting as to the meaning which he intended to convey.

He strolled idly over the small country where he dwelt, with an idle, thriftless band following him about from place to place. He talked to them in a rambling, disconnected, unscientific manner. His maxims or doctrines, such as they were, he never committed to writing, nor did he authorize any one to write them. I regard it as a proof of the ignorance and unscientific character of the mind of Jesus that he recognized the absurd and impossible fable of Noah and the flood, when the earth was said to be covered five miles deep with water and when eight human beings and three millions of animals, reptiles, birds, and insects were crowded into an ark, pitched air-tight, with but a single window at the top, and that closed, and that they remained there without food for thirteen months. And again by his recognizing the equally absurd story about Jonah being three days under water in the stomach of a fish. And again by his not knowing that the earth is round, which ignorance was shared by those who pretended to write the gospels, in which an account is given of how the devil took him up on to a high mountain and showed him all the kingdoms and countries of the earth. One thing most patent in this miserable story is that neither Jesus, the devil, nor the man who wrote the account knew the first thing about the rotundity of the earth, one of the simplest facts of nature. Do you really believe there is a mountain in Palestine high enough to enable any one to see from its top all the countries on the globe? If you do not believe this, then you must believe that the whole story is an out-and-out falsehood.

The best that can be said about the record of his teachings is that some thirty, forty, sixty, or one hundred and fifty years after he taught in Galilee some unknown persons, some of whom never heard or saw Jesus, essayed to give an account of what he said, and with the lapse of time that had taken place, the defects of human memory, the desire to have his teachings support certain doctrines and theories, the efforts to build up a new system of religion, with the tendency of those times to misstate facts, but little reliability can be placed upon what purports to be an account of Jesus's teachings.

That no copy of the original manuscripts has been seen for more than fifteen hundred years is conceded; that all the world has is copies of copies, and that many interpolations have been made; that many marginal notes by the different copyists and priests were incorporated into the text is admitted, and thus became the acknowledged word of God. So taking into consideration the almost worthless character of the teachings, in the first place, the wholly unauthentic and unreliable character of the reports of them by those who pretended to write his words out, the numerous changes and additions that have been made in them by scribes, priests, copyists, and designing persons, the record of the teachings of Jesus, as we have it, is of very little real value, and might as well not have been written.

The great claim set up for the teachings of Jesus is based upon the purity and excellence of his morals and the love for the human race which he enjoined. But admitting that in this respect he transcended what appears in the Old Testament, he did not excel what had been taught by many pagan sages and philosophers who lived hundreds of years before him; and whose moral teachings were as pure and faultless as those said to be uttered by him. It appears that he enunciated little or no new thought, and that nearly all he taught was not original, and had been spoken long before he existed. I have not space to give you specimens of this kind in this letter, but will endeavor to do so in my next.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

Another New Lecturer.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am now in the lecture field with a new lecture on "The Theology of the Revised New Testament." It is radical, critical, and positiv. It shows just what doctrins are touched, and on what a shaky foundation Christianity rests.

I want engagements in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, for Sundays during the summer. Terms moderate. Jacob Stinson.

Miscellaneous.

A Letter from Parker Pillsbury.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just attended one of the most important, because most needed, gatherings ever held in this city. It was called by the Spiritualists and Liberalists to protest against the late outrage on the freedom of the United States mails. In excluding from them the Physiologist, an able and valuable journal conducted and edited by Sara B. Chase, M.D., in New York, an atrocity has been perpetrated too flagrant to be overlooked by any who call themselvs free.

Lately I hav been giving some lectures in Rochester, being on my way homeward from Ohio.

The "Fraternity Liberal League of Rochester," learning that such a gathering was called in Buffalo, made haste to elect me to represent it there. I came accordingly, accompanied by Mrs. Amy Post, for half a century well known for her world-wide philanthropies and charities, and now president of the first Rochester League. Both of us were cordially greeted by the meeting and welcomed to the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Frank, whose spacious house and larger hearts are ever open to all faithful workers in the cause of man and woman kind.

The official report of proceedings will doubtless be furnished by the officers for your columns. I need therefore add nothing beyond my testimony to the ability and downright earnestness of the discussions, and the unanimity and spirit with which, at a late hour, the resolutions were adopted. It was indeed good to be there.

Do you suppose, Mr. Editor, that the myriad voters of the nation ever dream that they hav just put a Christian priest and preacher into the presidential chair? At a time, too, when the two mightiest powers on earth are as one in crushing out the last vestiges of liberty from the people, especially the laboring people, and preëminently the laboring poor! Women, as well as men? Women, even more than men?

The popular church and clergy are always one of those omnipotences. They stood with the slave power while chattel slavery lasted. Now the lords of the lash are no more, and the legions of Mammon hold sway. And church and clergy sanctify and support the foul idolatry, as slavery before.

Or are the people aware of the presence and activ working of the great American association known as the God-in-the-Constitution Society? Its officers are in every department of the national and state governments, numbering nearly a hundred in all! Judges, congressmen, governors, and legislators of states, archbishops, bishops, doctors of divinity, and elders in the church! And their avowed purpose is to vaccinate the federal Constitution with the names of their God, Christ, and Bible, with high trinitarian interpreters, as the only source of authority among nations, thus transforming our republic into the most odious theocracy ever known.

Or do the people know that the Protestant priesthood hav in the Young Men's Christian Association an auxiliary not half so talented but quite as terrible as ever were the Jesuits of Loyola to the Roman Catholic church?

Or do any even suspect that the "New York Society for the Suppression of Vice," now so cunningly called, is but part of the enginry of these confederated legions, working together day and night, constant as gravitation and almost as mighty? And that all this shameless babble about obscenity in Heywood, Dr. Foote, Bennett, Dr. Chase, and others like them, is only hypocritical pretense, with the double and concealed purpose of trampling out all free and honest thought and speech on the most sacred and important themes; and crushing and debasing woman more and more to man's unhallowed lust and power on the one hand, and on the other to at last seduce the nation to a heartless, lawless, ecclesiastical Plutocracy, as in France a hundred years ago, when church and state, the rich and the powerful, plundered the poor together and shared the spoil?

Let this self-constituted and then state-incorporated, but irresponsible, vice suppression society silence, as it may and will if possible, able and useful but respectable and decently-conducted journals like the Boston Investigator, Banner of Light, the Physiologist, The Truth Seeker, and others of like spirit and purpose, and who or what will be safe from its cruel, remorseless, and loathsome agents unless willing to bow to the behests of our secular and sacerdotal Vaticans, whatever may be their unrighteous demands?

That there is unblushing, shameless obscenity in the community which should be suppressed at whatever cost cannot be denied. That it is frightfully on the increase in our large cities may be equally true. The Bible is grossly open to the fearful charge. The clergy themselvs are frequently a baneful, direful example. These alone might giv work to Vice Societies, Young Men's Christian Associations, as well as the courts and prison wardens for many a month and year. And would they all turn their hands in that direction for a time, they would at least giv evidence of honesty and sincerity of heart and purpose, which at present it is impossible for any human eye to discover.

New Leagues and Members.

Since my last report three new Leagues hav joined the National Liberal League as follows:

No. 214. Beloit, Kan., Samuel Carter, Sec.
No. 215. Girard, Ill., Dr. R. S. Cowan, Sec.
No. 216. Assaria, Kan., John Peterson, Sec.

The annual membership also hav increased from fifty to seventy, as follows: Mrs. U. E. Harwood, Shelbyville, Ill.; Mrs. Caroline R. Doster, Marion Center, Kan.; James C. Lehmer, Washington, D. C.; J. E. Alexander, Maryville, Mo.; David S. White, Closter, N. J.; Dr. H. Patrick and Mrs. C. A. Patrick, Belleville, Kan.; I. B., Pa. (good Liberal who can't afford to be known); Thos. Atkinson, Oxford, Ind.; Philip Cowen, Petaluma, Cal.; Wm. Holgate, Mauston, Wis.; Thos. Goddard, Duquoin, Ill.; E. E. Carpenter, Lowell, Neb.; John A. Jost, Ogden, Utah; N. J. Johnson, Sioux Falls, Dak.; A. H. Frank, Buffalo, N. Y.; Delos Dunton, Carpentersville, Ill.; Frank O. Reilly, Warren, O.; M. Magnus, San Jose, Cal.

Now, Liberals of the country, can't you send me thirty more applications for annual membership right away so as to make the number one hundred within a month? Then after that we will see if we can't make it two hundred before the next annual League congress.

I am glad also to report the following gifts to the treasury of the National Liberal League: Frank O. Reilly, Warren, Ohio, $3; David S. White, Closter, N. J., $5; Byron Adonis and a few Liberals at San Francisco, Cal., $5; Mrs. S. J. Lenont, Northfield, Minn., $2; A. H. Frank, Buffalo, N. Y., $5; Jas. C. Lehmer, Washington, D. C., $10; J. E. Alexander, Maryville, Mo., $10; Leroy Dutton, Grand Mound, Iowa, $10; A. Vacher, London, England, £20 (realizing to the League treasury $96.20), aggregating in all, $156.20.

In part appreciation, if not payment, of the liberality of Mr. Vacher I sent him a certificate of life membership, which makes that list stand at ten, up to date. I hav to note with regret, in one view of it, that we must go out of the United States to find the one most liberal donor to the League treasury. I giv the letter of Mr. Vacher in its simple, modest, but expressiv brevity, as follows:

London, 12 Fitzroy street,
Fitzroy Square, April 20, 1881.

My Dear Sir: I hav read with sympathy your eloquent appeal on behalf of the Liberal League, and hav much pleasure in sending you £20 in answer. Yours very truly,

A. Vacher.

Now isn't there at least one Liberal here at home in these United States who can go Mr. Vacher $3.80 better and send the League treasury $100? Mr. Wilson's contribution of $100 to the National Defense Fund is lightning that struck pretty near it. Who can plug the exact bull's eye with $100?

Help the League.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I received a circular from T. C. Leland soliciting aid for the National Liberal League to further the objects of the League. I am with the League in all its objects as set forth in the circular, and favor more aggressiv measures besides. Although quite young when William Lloyd Garrison commenced his assaults on slavery and slave-holders, and when it was dangerous to be a Abolitionist, I was one with him, and shall never forget his terrific arraignment of slaveholders and their apologists and abettors. Although it stirred them up to threats, deeds of murder, and lynch law, he made the system so heinous that it melted away before his long and continued assaults. Now it strikes me we must be in earnest in this matter, which is holding more millions of the human race in bondage in this world, and consigning the greater part to endless torments hereafter. Such a hideous monster as this must be shorn of its power. Its promulgators and advocates should be held up to the contempt and execrations of mankind. We should boldly state the truth to the people that ministers and others that are propagating this doctrin are impostors and liars. As it is evidently a deception and a fraud, they are, every one of them, obtaining money under false pretenses to teach that of which they know nothing, and which is contradicted by all our experience and observation, as well as by the universal laws of all nature. Their dogmas, their gods, their heavens, and their hells are all shams and frauds to frighten the race into their support.

Therefore I think the whole church organization should be denounced by every Liberal, truth-telling paper in the land. We must come to the front and attack the monster, powerful as she is, with her millions of votaries, educated in her superstitions. with the more powerful weapons of truth and reason, and in time we shall assuredly dissipate the fogs and mists of superstition that hav blinded and bewildered the race. It will be no light task, but will require the united efforts of all Liberals, and I hope sufficient funds will be raised to fight this monster superstition of the world to its death. I would endow the National Liberal League with funds sufficient, if I had the means, to keep up a perpetual assault on its blood-stained battlements until they are felled to the earth never to rise again. I hope to see the day soon when some of our wealthy citizens will feel it their conscientious duty to endow the League with hundreds of thousands of dollars to carry on the good work of freeing the people from superstition and priestly rule. Appeal to the People.

I appeal from the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland to the people, from whom alone that Parliament derives its power. I hav only this appeal possible; there is no remedy in the law courts against the House of Commons, if that House should do injustice. I am a duly-elected member of the House of Commons. There is no petition against my return; not the slightest allegation of legal disqualification has been attempted. I hav been illegally, and in a manner without precedent in history, prevented by the Conservative party from taking my seat, and this under cover of a resolution which the House had no authority whatever to pronounce. In order to induce some members who were not Conservatives to support Sir Stafford Northcote in his utterly illegal opposition to myself, and in order also to induce other members to abstain from supporting the law, it was pretended that the objection was only that the Conservatives desired to prevent the oath being profaned.

This declaration hardly came with a good grace from those who amongst them had put forward a common informer to prosecute me for heavy penalties for not having taken the oath last year. This session Mr. Gorst has personally admitted being in direct and actual communication with the common informer plaintiff. The private solicitor of Mr. Newdegate conducts the suit for the common informer, and Sir H. Giffard, who moved the resolution last year preventing me from taking the oath, thinks it an act worthy a Christian gentleman to earn a fee by pleading against me in the penalty suit for not having taken that oath. When Sir Stafford Northcote, with help of two hundred and nine other members, had succeeded in breaking the law by preventing me from taking my seat, he suggested that I should—having made my claim—wait until some legislation was undertaken. Now that legislation is proposed, it turns out that every means and excuse of delay is to be resorted to. It is not the form of admission, it is the man himself to whom the Tories object. As a powerful section of the House illegally shut out John Wilkes one hundred and ten years ago, so a powerful section of the House tries to exclude me to-day. John Wilkes had private fortune, he had rich and titled friends. I hav no fortune, and my friends are amongst the poor. I appeal to the people for justice. To-day the Tories seek to exclude me; to-morrow they may seek to exclude some other chosen representativ of the people.

My opinions are, it is said, obnoxious to these men; but my opinions were for my constituents alone to judge; and, despite the grossest misrepresentation by my enemies, they hav twice elected me. I am their choice, and their lawful and unimpeached return should hav lawful protection. The House of Commons has overridden the law, and now I turn to the people. Sir Stafford Northcote says that he trusts there will be no repetition of scandalous scenes. It was indeed a scandalous scene when prejudice set aside all law, and members trampled on the statute book. The scandal is not caused by the man who strives to obey the law, but by those who prevent him from obeying it. As there is no legal justification for keeping me out of the House, my unscrupulous antagonists hav endeavored to excite religious, political, and social prejudices against me, and the endeavor is especially made by some men whose championship of any cause would do sore damage to it. It is said I am "Atheist, Republican, and Malthusian." I answer that I am a law-abiding Englishman; that whatever views I hav are mine, and that it is to the law alone I hav to answer for them. If those who now rely on the force of numbers inside the House to illegally put me down because of my opinions could but think, they would see the dangerous justification against themselvs for any other outside with the force of numbers behind him. If once the law is disregarded it is only force can decide. I desire to maintain the law; the House of Commons has broken that law, and I appeal to the people. My antagonists harass me with law suits; they assail me with calumny; they boast that they will drive me into the bankruptcy court by ruinous litigation. I appeal to the people. The government of Mr. Gladstone has taken a step to afford legal remedy against a continuance of this wrong to myself and my constituents. Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Randolph

Churchill, the first representing the property and the second the piety of the Tory party, hinder even the discussion of this remedy with petty obstruction and paltry objection. I appeal to the people. The Conservatives really wish, under cover of my case, to jeopardize the Irish Land bill and to delay the business of the country. I ask the people to speak out clearly, distinctly, thoroughly, and at once on this issue. CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

[From the Toronto Bystander.]

To the shame of British civilization and religion, the attack upon Mr. Bradlaugh and upon the civil rights of his constituents goes on, and has been technically successful in a court of law. The ringleaders are scamps, putting forward religion as a test for religious persecution. Set a coronet on Mr. Bradlaugh's head, giv him a large fortune, make him a Tory in politics, and though he were the most offensiv of Atheists and the most profligate of debauchees to boot, he would hav these crusaders at his feet. Christianity has nothing to do with the proceedings of such men; the gospel no more bids you rob an unbeliever of his rights as a citizen than it bids you pick his pocket or commit adultery with his wife. If Parliament allows a fine to be levied on Mr. Bradlaugh for taking the seat to which he had been duly elected, it will undergo a far greater disgrace than any that can be inflicted on it by Obstruction. To the argument of the Exclusionists that Parliament might hav to legislate for the state church, the answer is, first, that Parliament notoriously swarms with unbelievers (it has twenty already), and secondly, that the maintenance of a state religion has now become a wrong, and that one wrong does not justify another.

Abolishing the Devil.

When the revised version of the New Testament shall hav been placed in the hands of American readers, which will be in a few days, they will discover that the devil has been exorcised therefrom. The Oxford and Cambridge revisers appeared to hav reached the conclusion that a personal devil is a myth, so that they hav agreed that wherever, either in the Old or New Testament, the word devil, or Satan, or Beelzebub, or Lucifer appears, some euphemious term, such as "the spirit of or the disposition to evil," shall be substituted. No doubt the devil has, for a considerable time, been losing ground and growing obsolete by degrees among certain classes of society, and others besides Bob Ingersoll hav given him notice to quit. Then, again, see how some of the profane speakers of earth will hav their freedom of speech interfered with. It will in future be clearly irregular to tell any one to go to the devil. The force of the expression will be destroyed when a person is told to go to "his disposition to commit evil." The ordinary profane individual won't think that objurgation worth a cent. Then what about our deviled turkey and deviled kidneys? Any of the expressions substituted by the revisers will clearly be out of place here. To many the loss of the devil will be like the loss of an old friend. Indeed, it is only now that he is made to grasp his gripsack and get out that some people will discover how much the devil was thought of. Those races who worship him as a god—and even here in these United States there are professed devil-worshipers—will probably miss him most of all. We will not now enter into a polemical discussion as to who, if not Satan, got up the rebellion in heaven and was driven out. We leave all such subtleties to the churches and sects, which will hav a good time of it in teaching theology with the devil eliminated.

The Revised New Testament.

The London Standard of the 18th has an important editorial on the revised version of the New Testament. The article is the first really striking opinion published as yet. The tone of it will probably be that adopted by most critics and the people at large. The following are the main points: The writer of the article asserts that, "whatever scholars may think of the labors of the revisers, the impression produced upon the public mind is one of disappointment and dissatisfaction. It is deeply to be regretted that the revisers, judging by the work just published, hav apparently forgotten the conditions under which the task was intrusted to them. It is obvious that a great many of the alterations adopted hav been approved for reasons of mere literary criticism, which make us rather skeptical as to the infallibility or even good taste of the revisers.

"Where no material change in sense or substance of the authorized version has been shown to be required by the revisers, for the proper construction of the original, they hav nevertheless thought themselvs justified in mending the English and improving the grammar of passages which hav struck deep root in the hearts and memories of the English people. One word has been substituted for another at the whim of the New Testament company; moods and tenses hav been shifted about to satisfy some pedantic scheme of syntactical symmetry; a sentence treasured up in the popular mind and enriched beyond description by the pathetic associations of hundreds of years has been tortured and crucified into precise grammatical accord with the latest refinements of critical labor upon comparison of early manuscript texts, and thus been robbed of all its true value.

"The system upon which the revisers appear to hav acted, in our judgment, is altogether erroneous and deplorable." The writer then proceeds in some beautifully expressed passages to point out the position held by the scriptures among English-speaking peoples. "They hav been known by them and loved by them for centuries," he says, "and it is rash and reckless to shake this noble growth of centuries by attempting to harmonize it with the correctness of self-opinionated scholarship or to regulate it by the doubtful standard of taste accepted by a motley combination of theologians and professors. Even the Lord's Prayer, which every English-speaking child learns to lisp at its mother's knee, has not been spared. The revisers hav handled it as a bold commentator might handle a notoriously corrupt chorus in the 'Eumenides' or the 'Vacchæ.' St. Paul's praise of charity, unequaled in its own kind for ringing and rhythmical eloquence in the old version, is mangled and made irrecognizable by the senseless substitution of the word 'love' for 'charity.' The meaning is really obscured rather than elucidated by this change, while the music of the sentence is irretrievably lost. Alterations of the diction of the old version, involving no gain in sense, or a scarcely perceptible one, swarm in the revised edition, and in almost every instance it is impossible not to feel that the original translations, however inferior to those of the present revisers in precise and exhaustiv scholarship, textual or general, were infinitly their superiors in the rare and precious art of writing musical and masculine English prose.

"Had they purged the sacred text of the errors which had crept into it, and placed, where it was necessary, the variorum readings in the margin, they would hav performed useful and acceptable work. But in the effort to attain dry and merely mechanical accuracy of expression, they hav so 'revised' the book as to deprive it of much of its beauty, and they hav destroyed many of its historical associations." In conclusion the Standard writer says that it remains now for the revisers to rerevise the text they hav produced. If this new version is ever to be generally used and to sepersede the authorized version many of the alterations that hav been made must be discarded.

[The N. Y. Telegram, from which we extract the above, has the following upon the same subject:]

It is said that Dr. Crosby and a few other divines hav for three months past been quietly reading the revised New Testament at family prayers. We do not know how true the report is, but if it is entirely so it only shows that those gentlemen are not above stealing a march upon others less favorably situated than themselvs for obtaining copies of the improved and amended word of God. It may be thought that the popularity of the New Testament is shown in the fact that liberal arrangements hav been made to furnish an adequate number of the revised copies, in all sizes and styles of type and binding, as promptly as possible. But, alas! it must be recollected that it is not the popularity of the scriptures which promotes the desire, but the notorious anxiety of thousands of persons to know how far the changes that hav been made in translation will modify the old theological meanings. Millions of people would jump for joy did these new translations release them from that bondage of fear in which the dread of everlasting fire has held them from their youth. Judging from the accounts that hav been published of this new revision, however, it is certain that no thorough organic change has been made in any of those passages that are supposed to hold forth doctrins necessary to salvation. There is no reason to believe that the wish of the Bible reader will not continue to be the father of his thought, or that sects diametrically opposed to each other will not go on finding their ratification from the self-same text.

A New Lecturer in the Field.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having now enlisted for life in the invincible little army of Liberalism, and believing that a brief account of my movements, my doings, and my observations may be of service to the cause, and of interest to your many readers, I hav concluded to giv you such an account, from time to time, provided you hav room for it in your very valuable columns.

On the 27th of April, the Modesto Liberal League, of which I was President, held a special meeting to receive my resignation, and to show their appreciation of my services by the presentation of a beautiful and costly cane, appropriately engraved. I had never used a cane, but I am so proud of this one, and am so anxious to show it, that I am doing my best to learn to use it. At the same meeting one member of the League made me a present of a twenty-dollar gold piece to giv me "good luck" in the great work upon which I was just entering. This was Samuel Gates, one of the oldest Liberals, and one of the most enterprising farmers, of Stanislaus county. A few such Liberals in every community would giv "good luck" to our cause everywhere.

On the first day of the present month I reached this place, where I expect to remain till the morning of the 13th, when I go to Petaluma, a hundred miles further south, where I am to lecture on the evenings of the 14th and 15th, and maybe on one or two more evenings. In my next I will giv an account of my journey thither and of my lectures.

Ukiah, where I now am, is a beautiful and healthful town of 1500 inhabitants. It is the county town of Mendocino county, situated on the west side of Russian River, which is here scarcely more than a beautiful mountain brook. The town is almost hidden among groves of evergreens, live oaks, pines, manzanitas, madronas, etc., and is surrounded by some of the finest mountain scenery in the world. Men weary with business cares can find few better places at which to rest.

There ase some excellent Liberals here, most of whom are of the Spiritualistic type, but they lack leaders and hav no organization. Here is a fine field for a good local worker. Who will occupy it? The churches, of which there is one for every three hundred inhabitants, hold a kind of despotic sway over the people. I hav heard only one sermon during my stay here, and that was a wail of sorrow and indignation because Saul, who ought to hav known better than to do as he did, asked information of a woman at Endor, a spiritual medium, instead of asking it of the Lord (whoever that was), who would not communicate with him at all. Waxing warm, the holy man called this woman, of whom the Bible says nothing ill, "a vile hag, a sorceress, an impostoress," etc.; called her house "a diabolical den," and strongly intimated that she was not good-looking. Having thus, simply by the calling of ugly nick-names, demolished this ugly woman and her ugly den, he pitched into the modern witches of Endor, the spiritual mediums of the present time, and in the same way demolished them also. Having accomplished this wonderful achievement for the glory of God, he was happy, and his flock looked upon him as a veritable hero. I would like to hav been heard on the other side, but I had no opportunity.

And now, lest I make my first letter too long, I will wish you increased prosperity and close.

Ukiah, Cal. JOHN R. KELSO.

Sunday in America.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 11, 1879, you were so kind as to publish a communication headed, "Sunday in America," which was written by me. The Sunday question, chiefly as to theatrical performances, being now agitated in this city, you would oblige me by allowing me to add the following remarks to that communication.

Those Americans who, by prohibitory Sunday laws, want to prevent their fellow-citizens from decently amusing themselvs, and thus indirectly compel them (no other places but churches being left open for the gathering of people), to attend divine services on Sunday, attempt to violate religious liberty and liberty of conscience. But these noble prerogativs are explicitly and distinctly guaranteed to the American people by the Constitution of the United States, which, according to its own provision, is "the supreme law of the land." The Constitution, an American mental product, rules the Bible, and the Bible, a mental product of the Eastern hemisphere, does not rule the American Constitution in this country.

The latter does not say only, "Congress shall make no law prohibiting the exercise of religion," but it expressly says, "Congress shall make no law prohibiting the free exercise of religion." If the word "free," in this connection, has any significance, as it doubtless has, it means an exercise of religion untrammeled by the Bible, or by church institutions, or by both. That word plainly proves that our American Constitution cares nothing at all for either orthodoxy or heterodoxy. It leaves it to every man to arrive at his own religious convictions as he sees fit and chooses, and thus to become happy and saved in his own way and according to his own fashion, undisturbed by others. The Americans referred to, therefore, are no truly free men, no truly free citizens, of this free conntry. They must be considered as men that are in spirit English religionists. But what has the religion of monarchical England, where they hav no amusements on Sunday, to do with free and independent America? By England the British Isles are meant.

Very respectfully yours, JOHN G. HERTWIG.

MRS. A. H. COLBY AND MRS. O. K. SMITH will attend the yearly meeting at Waterloo, N. Y., June 4th and 5th, en route for the East. Parties wishing their services along the route will please address Mrs. Colby or Mrs. Smith, 123 West Eagle street, Buffalo, N. Y. 2t21

Letters from Friends.

BRUNSWICK, MO., May 17, 1881.

DEAR OLD FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $10—$5 for the trip round the world, and $5 to support THE TRUTH SEEKER during your absence from home. If you don't go, put it to your stay-at-home fund—it will be right anyway. Respectfully, FRED. HECK.

EUREKA, WIS., May 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $13—$5 for J. M. Rounds, and $5 for myself, as pledged for your trip round the world, and $3 on paper account. May you hav a prosperous and happy journey!

Yours truly, E. B. ROUNDS.

LA VETA, COL., May 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $5, as per agreement, to help you make that long journey. I wish you a pleasant trip. Yours, F. A. MOORE.

GRANBURY, TEX., May 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $5 to cover my pledge on the trip round the world. Hope you will hav an enjoyable journey. Yours truly, F. C. BUSH.

WARREN, O., May 17, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed I send you $5, the amount of my subscription for the voyage round the world.

Respectfully yours, DUNCAN MCLAREN.

AMBOY, ILL., May 14, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I send you $5, the same to be placed to my credit for your journey round the world. May success be with you in your undertaking.

Liberally yours, CHAS. RANDALL.

EMPORIUM, PA., May 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $10, my mite for the trip round the world, and my best wishes with thee, hoping you will hav a prosperous journey. Yours truly, SAMUEL KIRK.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 20, 1881.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: I wish to aid you in making your proposed trip round the world. I pledge myself to giv you one hundred dollars for the purpose, and I will be one to see that THE TRUTH SEEKER does not suffer for want of means to keep up its regular weekly visits. Did not my rapidly-growing business demand my constant attention, I would assuredly accompany you on your proposed journey. I hope some good Liberal friend will decide to bear you company. Yours truly, WM. WILSON.

WYOMING, IOWA, May 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $9—$5 for your trip round the world and $4 for yours and R. G. Ingersoll's picture, oil-painted, imperial size. I hope you will hav a pleasant journey, learn much, and be able to write your books and get home safe and sound. If I ever get the books, as I expect, I think you will be entitled to another $5, which you shall hav if I liv. I am somewhat older than you, but in good health, and expect to see your books.

ABNER KIMBALL.

MOMENCE, ILL., May 11, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $15, which you will please credit to H. S. Hall, Charles Wiltz, and Ichabod Stodard, all of this place, for your book or books of trip round the globe. I see by the last number of your paper that you will take the trip, and I hope that every one who subscribed will be as prompt as we hav been, as we think we will get more than the worth of our money. May the good angels, if there are any, be with you all the way round is the prayer of the undersigned. H. S. HALL.

READING, PA., May 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $5, my subscription to help enable you to swing the circle. When you get to the river Jordan, where God and Jacob took the side-hold (and God unjointed Jacob, though after an all night's hard tussle), I want you to send me a small cobble-stone or a little dust in a letter as a sacred relic. With this, my last request, I wish you God speed.

H. N. PROUTY.

QUINCY, O., May 16, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Herewith inclosed you will please find $10—$5 to pay for the trip round the world and the remainder to pay for books, etc., as indicated by inclosed slip. I trust that all who hav interest in the circumnavigation scheme will not long withhold the "needful," but will respond promptly, and that you may soon engage in this, certainly the greatest undertaking of your life work. Let us hav no clogging of wheels now, but all lend a helping hand in bringing out this great descriptiv work, which certainly will be entirely new and different from anything we now hav. Yours truly,

C. H. CUSTENBORDER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I herewith hand you the $20 I pledged you to help you round the world. I hav read with decided interest your letters from Europe. Three years ago I went over much the same ground and had nothing else to do but view the sights I passed, but it has been a wonder to me how you could see so much and write so much about it in the time. I hav given away to Christian friends and others more than a dozen copies of the volume of your letters, and could hav induced many others to read them had you given a different title to the book. The term "Infidel" frightens many. If you will issue another edition and giv the work a different title I will take twenty-five copies. If you will giv as full and interesting descriptions of what you see on your trip round the world, I will be fully satisfied. Yours truly, A. S. WHEELER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 14, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5, my contribution to your trip round the world. If at last you should not go, then credit me with the same on your book.

Dear friend, having been twice round the world myself, I hav some idea of what you will hav to endure in your journey, and let me tell you to be very careful of all water you may hav to drink, for that is the most prolific cause of disease to which incautious travelers are subject; also be careful in exposing yourself to the malarial influence of the night air in the tropical climes, for you know it is not every man who has the number of friends and admirers to mourn their loss as you hav. I can sincerely tell you my wife and myself would miss you greatly, as we hav looked to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER as being our bright and guiding stars for the past six years, constantly guiding us on to higher and higher conceptions of morality with every issue of your noble paper. I do not think the Christian can possibly hav grander moral sentiments or nobler self-sacrificing efforts than are shown to us through THE TRUTH SEEKER. Speaking conscientiously of myself, I never felt happier than since I hav been an Infidel; and for that happiness I hav to thank you and THE TRUTH SEEKER; so it is no wonder I should exhibit some concern for him who is dear to us all; and if prayer were of account I would pray that you may be enabled to return in safety to us again.

I hav every confidence in Bro. Macdonald being able to conduct the business during your absence, for he has on former occasions proved himself worthy of your trust. My kind regards to him.

With our best wishes for your welfare, I am, sincerely, Your friend, W. F. PORTER.

MARMORA, ONT., CAN., May 9, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th inst. is at hand, and I find that such is the pressure made by your round-the-world subscribers that you feel bound to go. I notice your call for the necessary fives so promised, and I therefore make haste to answer your call by inclosing that amount. Remember, I am not thrusting you out perforce. You hav, no doubt, weighed the matter carefully, if not prayerfully, and having studied out all its bearings, hav a general knowledge of what is before you. If you feel satisfied to make the journey, I say by all means go. If you hav any serious doubts in the matter, I would say, emphatically, remain. Do whatever you conclude is best. Yours, ED PAYNE, M.D.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 18, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: We hav just closed what the Methodists would call a blessed season of revival in our creed-bound city. For the last six weeks we hav had the service of that brave, earnest Infidel missionary, Mrs. H. S. Lake, who has been shaking up the old bones of orthodoxy; and let me say that none better than the above-named lady ever entered the field. She is brave, earnest, eloquent, and devoted to her work. Whenever a League needs the service of a lecturer, it can do no better than to secure her. She has been in the field for several years, working for a mere pittance, and deserves all the encouragement that can be given her. We are endeavoring to raise means to secure her return to us in the fall. Remembering that this is the city that refused to place the bust of Thomas Paine in our National Museum, and that perverted the legacy of the Infidel Girard, her work has been a great success. We hav gained a number of new members for the Robert Burns League, and awakened some of the old members to a sense of duty. We feel quite encouraged by the result. With another such a revival we are satisfied we will be able to gather together a strong League, and indeed be an auxiliary to the noble work of the National Liberal League.

Yours for justice and toleration, AL JENKINS.

ROCKFORD, ILL., May 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $10, in payment of Dr. H. L. Buckner's and my own subscription of $5 each for the trip round the world and a book detailing the wonders you see en route. After reading the views of others, and thinking much on the subject, I am now of the opinion that the cause you represent, the paper you publish, and your own material happiness would be advanced by your remaining at home; but since your resolution is to go, allow me to assure you that none will watch your movements with greater interest than Dr. Buckner and myself, and none will be more rejoiced than we to welcome you home again. We trust that your journey will be one of pleasure, and that through the eyes of a Liberal we may see much of those countries and peoples whose ancestors paved the way to our own exalted civilization, but whose religious teachings, however, were, unfortunately, the parents of the present Christian faith which we are laboring so earnestly to eradicate. In success or misfortune, allow me to subscribe myself, G. W. BROWN, M.D.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH. TER., April 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: To the many Liberals who are preparing to migrate westward in search of locations to build homes for themselvs and their children, but who are undecided just where to settle, I wish to say through your valuable paper, Come to Washington Territory; and the reasons for giving this invitation, are, 1st. Because we wish our Liberal friends to come here and enjoy with us a country possessed of more natural advantages than any other section of the Union; where hundreds and thousands can find homes; where the climate is mild and healthful; where the soil is rich and productiv; where vast prairies are ready for the plough; where labor is in demand and capital needed; where are found the finest forests in the world; where the coal beds are inexhaustible; where gold and silver mines are being profitably worked; where iron and copper are mined; where twenty rivers offer cheap transportation for the products raised in their valleys, and are stocked with a great variety of fine fish; where game is abundant; where fruit of almost every variety is successfully grown, and where dairying, woolgrowing, stock-raising, farming, mining, ship-building, fishing, merchandising, and manufacturing, all return large interest on the amounts invested, and where there is plenty of room for more; and 2d. Because we need the united assistance of many Liberals to help continue the work of building up the future commonwealth of Washington, that its citizens for all future time may here enjoy liberty in its fullest sense. That work has been begun, and is steadily advancing, and I doubt if in any part of the world outside of this territory can be found churches and church property advertised for sale for delinquent taxes as is the case here where the revenue law provides that all property shall bear equal taxation (and for this law the territory is indebted to J. A. Kuhn, of this town, who, while a member of the legislature, introduced and passed this act, against the united opposition of the seven ministers then at our capital). Our laws as a whole are quite as Liberal as in any state or territory, and I think an attempt (as is being made in New York) to make Good Friday a legal holiday would fail in this territory at this time; our school law is an excellent one, and our schools are of as high grade as in the older states; in most of the counties school is taught nine months in the year. The insane and poor are well-provided for by territorial appropriations, and other things are in proportion. These are some of the reasons that prompt me to extend the invitation, and I hope you will giv it space, and that it may result in some good. I remain, Yours truly,

BENJ. S. HOXSIE.

CENTRAL, S. C., May 8, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER you hav decided to make that long journey round our planet. This to me is sad news; but as you say those favoring the project are twenty to one against those who oppose the measure, I of course will with the rest of the small minority hav to submit and reluctantly say "Good-bye." I am not sure that I hav any right to a voice in this affair, any way. "Deadheads," as a general rule, should keep silent, and I hope I hav made no serious departure from the rule.

My objections to your journey may not prove as weighty as some others, but I can assure you they are as honestly and as sincerely entertained as any that hav appeared or been expressed through the paper. I hav carefully read and considered the pros and cons in regard to this adventure, and feel to-day just as I did when I first read Mr. Coleman's letter, and if I was only half as able as the majority of your donors I would freely giv you $100 to stay at home rather than giv $5 to get you away. In the name of reason and common sense, what do the people think of in sending you away just as the war against Comstockism is being inaugurated? You, the only man who ever gave us a correct measure and a true picture of that notorious scoundrel, Anthony Comstock! Why can't the people see that in sending you abroad they are accommodating Comstock. Why, he is chuckling now in his sleeve at the prospect of your trip, and I can almost realize the good, long breath he will take the moment he sees you start. I should not be at all surprised to learn that Comstock had secretly contributed to the round-the-world fund. No man will be more delighted at seeing you start than Anthony Comstock. When you are gone his most dangerous antagonist is out of the way. He would rather hav the bloodhounds of an orthodox hell on his track than D. M. Bennett.

I know your friends are actuated by the kindest and noblest feelings in sending you round the world, but I fear and believe the most of them will some day regret the movement, and wish they had given you the money to hav been appropriated in a different way. It will probably take $2,500 or $3,000 to defray your expenses. This sum goes out just at the time we need every cent we can raise in defending our most sacred right against the Comstock invasion. Yes, my dear old brother and most cherished friend, we need all the brains and all money right now, and right at home. We can spare no Bennetts or money. We want more Bennetts and more Wilsons, more Wakemans and more Lelands, more Elminas and more Saras; in fact, we need everyone we hav and every man in the field. I am but a poor, feeble, old man, but I can and will do something if the conflict between Liberal justice and Comstock rascality goes on, and I hope it will. I long to witness the crisis, and am ready at any time if need be to lay down my life rather than submit to the villainous encroachments of priestcraft and churchianity.

But I am intruding and will stop right now. Let me say, if you go I hope your journey may (contrary to my anticipations) prove a success. May every comfort and the best of health be yours. I shall often think of you and long for your safe return.

Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., May 2, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: By your permission I drop you these lines. There are so many persons of so many opinions that it seems almost useless to say a word to you on the round-the-world trip. On page 280 of THE TRUTH SEEKER you say, "Our sole wish is to do the most good we can and to please friends as far as possible." I've only been reading your paper for the last eight months, but I see in the brief length of time that there are a large number of your correspondents that put an unusual confidence in what you say. For this reason I think it would be best that you remain at your post. And from what I hav gathered from the reading of your paper, I do not see as there are many that would be displeased to know that they were spiritual beings; and as you and your readers are truth seekers, what objection is there to your employing a good physical medium and giving this subject a thorough going over, not merely for a day or a week, but take one or two years' time for it, and see clearly what are the facts in the subject? If we are spiritual beings, it seems as though it would be to our interest to know the fact, and who can investigate the subject for so many to any better advantage than yourself? I am of the opinion that Spiritualism is a gem worth looking after. I once was in the presence of what claimed to be a spirit, and he was speaking of spirits and he conveyed the exact ideas as to spirits that you hav expressed on the subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Very respectfully yours, D. THING.

GREENSBORO, IND., April 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: During the past winter the Christian element of this place inaugurated a revival for the sole purpose of hitting Infidelity a stunning blow. They became alarmed at the rapid spread of Liberal sentiment, and took this method to undermine the faith of the slightly credulous; and, strange as it may seem, quite a number of persons who had seemingly thrown off the chains of mental slavery accepted Christ, and with loud thanks for the blessed change enlisted in the Lord's army, henceforth to fight under the cherished banner of King Emanuel. But the loss of these few deluded worshipers at the shrine of a false and fickle God by no means discouraged the many noble men and women who still cling with unceasing tenacity to the grand and beautiful faiths that for long years has been to them a never-failing fountain of inexpressible joy.

Many years ago an old gentleman from North Carolina settled in this place, and soon became extensivly known as a man of good business qualities, strict integrity, and honest convictions. In his early life he was an honored member of the Quaker church, and was one of the few who lived out his faith. When he began business as a dry-goods merchant people from far and near (the country was then sparsely settled) flocked to his counters, and he soon found himself on the road to prosperity. Notwithstanding his numerous acts of charity to the poor, and his liberal donations to all benevolent enterprises, his wealth continued to increase, and in after years when he retired from activ life he possessed ample means.

Uncle Seth Hinshaw, for such was the appellation by which he was known, was possessed of splendid natural talent, and was quite persistent in his search after truth, and when the peculiar tenets of the Spiritualistic faith began to permeate the minds of the western people he was one of the first to accept that unpopular doctrin, believing it to contain the most plausible proof of a glorious immortality. His life was so pure and unselsh that those who opposed his faith still loved and admired him; and as the years rolled on many learned to believe as Uncle Seth, and to his kind words and exemplary course may be attributed the origin of Liberalism in this place.

In 1861 he erected a cosy building here and gave it the name of Progress Hall. The walls of this humble temple of worship frequently echoed to the voice of eminent advocates of reform, who now liv only in the memory of those who learned from them the noble principles which so beautifully illuminate the pathway of life. In 1866 this venerable benefactor of the human race passed to the unknown in the full triumph of his glorious faith. At his death the aged bowed in sorrow and the young wept bitter tears of grief. Little children scattered flowers before the hearse that bore his honored remains to the tomb, and upon his coffin was deposited a rich profusion of those sacred emblems of the dead. Such was the life of one of the most honored Liberals that now sleep in Greensboro's silent "city of the dead."

Some time since a number of prominent citizens of this place conceived the idea that an eminent Liberal lecturer could add laurels to the cause by properly representing the glowing, sparkling truths embodied in the new faith. Dr. J. S. Byres, a well-known Liberal, began a correspondence with Mr. B. F. Underwood, of Mass., which finally culminated in the latter gentleman's consent to lecture here on his contemplated tour through the West. When the message arrived announcing the 23d of April as the time best suited to the convenience of lecturer, the liberally-disposed citizens began to make due preparations to giv him a respectable reception. Old Progress Hall was deemed insufficient to contain the immense audience likely to assemble on this intensely interesting occasion, and Hodson's Hall, of a seating capacity of six hundred, was secured. On Saturday night the hall was comfortably filled by an enthusiastic audience, and when Mr. Underwood made his appearance he was greeted with a grand but silent welcome. His lecture, entitled "The Influence of Christianity on Civilization," was a sublime production and embraced two hours in its delivery. The speaker was frequently applauded, and most especially when he paid a glowing tribute to the intellectual merit of Col. Ingersoll.

On Sunday morning the hall was again filled with a highly-attentiv and cultured audience. The subject matter of this lecture exhibited great research and a thorough knowledge of many of the beautiful elements of science. Mr. Underwood is not eminently eloquent, he cannot carry an audience by storm, but the truths he utters are clothed in forcible language and occasionally adorned with such flowers of rhetoric as to leave an indelible impression on the minds of his audience. Thus far he has more than met the expectations of the people, and the best wishes of a host of new-made friends will follow him all along the highways of life. W. H. BEARD.

ELGIN, ILL., May 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your kind favor. I can only speak in the highest terms of the Besant-Hatchard debate. It is a book well worth the attention of all lovers of real racy and spicy literature. As a book of reference, it will be found replete with historic facts not generally known, and explained in a manner that givs us a good insight of the knowledge and remarkable ability of that noble lady, Mrs. Besant, to easily cope with the most perplexing questions that her opponents would giv as characteristics which she alone possesses and deals with telling effect.

Yours truly, JAMES METCALF.

APPLE RIVER, ILL., April 27, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I was enchanted with the reading of a copy of your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, not long ago, which a Liberal friend of mine had received from you and loaned to me. I was not really aware until reading your paper of the great strides Liberalism has been taking in the past few years. I was surprised to learn of such a vast number of people that, by the account of your paper, seem to be of the Freethinking or Infidel class of mind throughout the United States. I had a faint idea of the extensivness of Infidelity. I thought the belief was entertained only by a few. At the same time I had read Col. Ingersoll's lectures, filled with matchless eloquence, pathos, wit, satire, truth, and argument against the authenticity and inspiration of the Bible and the superstitions and dogmas that had been created in the minds of the people by the teaching of an unauthorized and false work. Yet I was led to credit prejudiced and false newspaper reports, too often, of Ingersoll's meetings, to the effect that the people went to hear him lecture not because they believed as he did, but out of a mere curiosity to hear what he had to say, and from the name he had acquired of being a great orator.

It seems to me that it is very hard for editors of religious papers to giv justice to Infidels or those who differ with them on the subject of Christianity; and editors of political papers, many of them, are either orthodox or more or less influenced by religion. Still I am happy to know that we hav in America one editor (D. M. Bennett) who is broad and Liberal enough to want to giv every one rights equal to what he claims for himself, and one who edits an Infidel paper, and has the Liberality and kindness to allow through its columns people of all shades of belief room to express their ideas.

Where the gaining of truth is the object, as is the case with you and your paper, we need not be too particular as to its source, for it will always well pay the possessor for all the labor and search spent in acquiring it. It is only the bigot and hypocrit that scorns truth and fears to investigate. Truth never errs; it is as permanent as the sun. Falsehoods, dogmas, and superstitions are like the dark clouds that float between, hiding at times the sun from view, but not entirely eradicating its real light and warmth.

Thus it is with truth, for although it has been in the past hidden deep in falsehoods and superstitions created by pious frauds, and lies priests hav invented to keep humanity in the narrow belief of a creed founded upon the superstition and barbarism of the ancients, still the truth cannot be longer hidden; it is dawning, and already through the gauzy clouds can be plainly seen its brilliant orb, heralding by its light and warmth the coming of a grander and better day.

Since subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav rea with much pleasure and interest each number's contents, especially your discussion with Mr. Mair. am pleased to see you handle him with such apparent ease. I intend to continue taking THE TRUTH SEEKER right along, and although I hav subscribed for but for a few months, you can rely upon me as a constant subscriber.

Respectfully yours, E. INGERSOLL.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., May 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Under date of February 28th last a correspondent from Onondaga Valley, N. Y., writes you as follows: "We hav two insurance offices in this place; one nearly first-class for a country office, and Presbyterian; the other about fourth or fifth-class, and Methodist (one-horse concern); but both insure at the same rate."

These "insurance offices," I take it, insure against hell fire. Here in our village there were formerly two insurance offices, one Congregational, the other Calvinistic Baptist. The last-named office has shut up shop. The first-named still livs, but at a poor, dying rate. This Congregational office was started and got under way in 1814, I am told. It went on its way rejoicing until about 1830, when there was a split; or, as some polite Christians would term it, "schism." The rock on which they split was "close communion" and "immersion." Then was the Baptist insurance office started with a great flourish of trumpets. They had Elder Knapp (of revival fame) here, and the result was a very protracted meeting, and they cried and roared dreadfully. This expression, "cried and roared," originated in the following manner: While this protracted meeting was in full blast, one of those who attended it (a very zealous adherent) was employed building a chimney for a neighbor about a mile across the river which runs through this place. The man for whom the chimney was being built did not take much stock in churches (hell fire insurance offices), or revivals either, for that matter. He interrogated our Baptist mason regarding the great reformation, and when he had learned the state of excitement which prevailed, he said: "Yes, I hear them cry and roar dreadfully, like the niggers out South. They hav these revivals out there to scare the niggers."

The Congregational insurance office, during this revival, was left quite in the background, and the under-shepherd who went in and out before them to break unto them the bread of life did his level best to keep his flock securely in the fold, and discouraged any and all sympathy with or participation in the Baptist insurance office revival. This Congregational under-shepherd just mentioned was a firm believer in infant damnation. He employed the following language one Sabbath day when enlarging on this orthodox doctrin, "My brethren, there are infants in hell not a span long."

Returning to the Baptist insurance office, I may say that, with varied successes, the concern went along until about 1865, or perhaps a year or two later, when it struck its colors, and is now defunct. The other insurance office struggles on after a fashion, and there is a fair prospect that in less than a decade of years we will see the closing up of the entire affair.

The first Freethinker whom I recollect to hav seen in this place was Mr. James Law, who came here from Nantucket, and lived with his daughter. He was a subscriber for the Boston Investigator, which paper I then saw (in 1849 or '50) for the first time. I shall always remember a story which I heard him tell many times with much gusto. It was concerning a certain minister in Nantucket. It seems there was a miller there who was a Freethinker, and he used to grind on the Lord's day. The minister met him one day and expostulated with him for breaking or fracturing God's holy day in such a "shocking" manner. The miller listened to the ministerial tirade very calmly, and when it had spent itself he said: "I will tell you what I will do. If you will shut up your gospel shop—where you get your living—on Sunday, I'll shut up my mill—where I get my living—too." There is a strong probability that the minister did not accede to the honest Nantucket miller's proposition.

Mr. Law was a nativ, I believe, of Perth, Scotland. He went from this place to Ravenna, Ohio, where he died. He was a great admirer of David Hume, the noted Scotch Freethinker, and was the owner of his works. I might write at greater length, but will stop, not wishing to encroach to too great an extent on your time, space, and patience.

Very truly, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

BOSTON, MASS., May 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: All hail to your war on the silent e's as far as you go; anything to reform our orthography, though I see quite a number of these "e's" escape you; but why can't you go a step farther, and attack the rascally double letters?

I took a page of your paper at random and counted 100 of these doublets, and 90 per cent, at least, of these could be discarded without leading one astray the least iota, more especially where the doublets are consonants, as the most of them are, such as n's, tt's, rr's, ss's, and pp's.

Yours for reform, JOHN HARDY.

The Woman Taken in Adultery.

BY ALHAZA.

"Kneel not, fair woman, I am not a god,
But I will make this gross old planet burn;
I'm tired of running in an ancient rut,
And from old musty creeds will gladly turn.

"One vile law crumbles when I plead for thee,
And I could love thee, but thou turn'st away;
Thy silken lashes fall, as weeps the dew
On some ill-favored, mournful autumn day.

"I hav no beauty that thou could'st desire,
But I will pour on men my withering scorn,
I glory in my strength, I hav the power,
To make them hate the day that they were born.

"Truth is a weeping martyr, too obscure
To bring strange phantoms to adorn the sky;
But flames and hells will fix the wondrous date
When I in loathsome pomp shall sink and die.

"I'll raise the dead, I'll fill the shuddering air
With scent of corpses, till they giv me room;
And for two thousand years the tale shall ring
Of white-winged sentinels around my tomb.

"My eyes are blue and fearful, I will scare
Weak market-men, and chase them with all speed
Around the temple with a knotted scourge,
And lash their feeble shoulders till they bleed."

And more than this: "I pray thee, Christ, be calm;
From all I cherished I was torn away;
And I am forced to dwell with one I hate,
Through howling storm and falling bloom of May.

"How can I bear it? I will lay me down
And take these perfumed blossoms to my heart;
Perhaps I could endure the fearful wrong
If I could blessings to the world impart.

"My tortured heart had not the iron power
To shun the heaven of a pleading look;
Medusa's serpents drive the soul away,
To gaze on wild flowers and the dimpled brook.

"When the bold, whitewashed hands of brutal power
Would dole out justice with an impious grace;
They shield themselvs and friends in posture high,
And throw their stones in some poor helpless face.

"From her sweet home they drag a woman pale,
To be some jailer's victim, drudge, or toy,
And should she listen once to heaven's sweet voice,
They hunt her down and trample and destroy.

"Think me not bold, but frame no iron law
To bind the burning thoughts of honest men,
Lest they should feel the insolence of power,
Pining and wasting in a narrow den.

"We want no dungeons to inclose our forms,
No flames to parch the brow of earnest thought,
But generous words of freedom shall be ours,
Schooled, as the mountain breezes hav been taught."

Charity versus Faith.

BY HOMER A. BILLINGS.

The man who wrongs another
Out of a single cent
May pray (just for a show),
But he never will go
Where "good old Stephen" went.

Mere faith will never save him;
Of that he need not boast;
Joined he will be
To that company
He now prays God to roast.

But the man who loves humanity
And lends a helping hand,
Ready to bless
All in distress,
God will not see him damned.

Let charity abound
Where honest doubt hath risen.
Don't persecute
Man like a brute
Or shut him up in prison.

Folks talk of going to heaven,
Where old things are made new.
To all be kind,
Then you will find
That heaven will come to you.

The Boundless Love of God.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

If God has boundless love for man
No hate could enter in his plan,
For that would limit love, and so
He could no boundless love bestow.

Then is there any God above
Who is endowed with boundless love?
Who formed a scheme for man below
That brings him death and endless woe?

A God of love, and yet to Eve
He sent a serpent to deceive,
Then cursed her when she took a bite
Of tempting fruit he placed in sight.

A God of love, yet predestined
This curse should fall on all mankind.
A God of love, yet knew full well
The child he made he'd sent to hell.

Through love he drowns the human race;
Through love gave Satan here a place;
Through love made hell and misery—
Destined it from eternity.

Through love he hardened Pharaoh's heart
So he'd not let the Jews depart;
In love, then, o'er the land he flew
And all the first-born children slew.

Oh, wondrous love, that frauds supply
That mankind may believe a lie;
That palms off a delusiv sham
So he may hav excuse to damn!

Oh, wondrous love, to thus deceive,
That damns men if they can't believe!
His wretched offspring dooms to hell—
Preserves them just to hear them yell.

And hell exists by his good will;
Through love he won't the devil kill;
His boundless love they satiate.
If this is love, then what is hate?

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case Carefully Considered! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Ruptnre), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Important to Invalids. The Most Marvelous Invention in the World

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.
Our depots are open free for inspection toall classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use.
Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.
The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that at fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DET. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and coustrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apopiexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within tweuty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom sufferiug humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble; she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs. Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swadding-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age sufferiug from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patieuts, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and inveution, although there are one huudred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Meu in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their dowufall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fultou Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyu and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their conscieucces for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-teuths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR
THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

JUSTICE is the great standing law of civil society, and any policy without justice is, in the end, no policy at all.—Edmund Burke.

THE quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed;
It blesses him that givs and him that takes.
—Shakspere.

WHEN the Tiber overflowed its banks, the pagans declared that it was owing to the wrath of the gods against the Christians; the Christians retorted that it was owing to the wrath of God against the idolaters. To a man like Pliny, who studied the phenomena with his note-book in his hand, where was the difference between the two?—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

FOR gold the merchant plows the main,
The farmer plows the manor;
But glory is the soldier's prize,
The soldier's wealth is honor.
The brave poor soldier ne'er despise,
Nor count him as a stranger;
Remember he's his country's stay
In day and hour o' danger. —Burns.

THAT of two individuals whose degree of virtue is so similar that the question of precedence can neither be decided by the keenest human insight, nor expressed by the finest minutiæ of human language, one would be rewarded with eternal joy, and the other be condemned to everlasting torment, is assuredly among the rudest of religious conceptions. Yet, to all appearances, such is the notion of future retribution held by the New Testament writers.—W. R. Greg.

CONSIDER Jesus's idea of prayer. Is it consistent with the conception of a universe governed by law? Can we rationally pray for bread, expecting any answer, save through natural sources of supply? Is it reasonable to pray for rain or fair weather, or any deviation from the ordinary working of natural laws? If these laws are simply God's method of working, would not such a prayer be not only irrational but sacrilegious? Is there any escape from the result of trespasses against these laws?—F. R. Index.

FRUGALITY and assiduity, a certain grave composure, an earnestness (not without its constraint, then felt as oppressiv a little, yet which now yields its fruit), were the order of our household. We were all particularly taught that work (temporal or spiritual) was the only thing we had to do, and incited always to precept and example to do it well. An inflexible element of authority surrounded us all. We felt from the first (a useful thing) that our own wish had often nothing to say in the matter.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

CHRISTIANITY has been called the workingman's religion, but the workingman wants a religion that will giv him a better home to liv in, not a religion that builds costly churches and assesses the property of the poor to pay the taxes that these churches should pay themselvs. Christianity offers the workingman happiness hereafter, but what he wants is land, home, and happiness here. More of earth and less talk about heaven is what he needs. The workingman's religion must answer his wants and desires; it must insist upon justice in work, in wages and trade.—L. K. Washburn.

THE star of his unconquered will
He rises in my breast,
Serene and resolute and still,
And calm and self-possessed.
And thou, too, whosoe'er thou art,
That readest this brief psalm,
As one by one thy hopes depart,
Be resolute and calm.
Oh, fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong. —Longfellow.

PLAINLY the human ideal has a very searching "No" to pronounce in our age. Its dreams of art, science, philosophy, social justice, hav to grow, like the infant Hercules, by strangling hydras and eating the sinews of bears. Every reform is at best a plowshare that must cut its way through drifts of prejudice to the world's quick, thus brightening its own edge for the better service of coming husbandry. Do you fear negation? Progress is negation; every step denies a past, disclaims a future. Life and birth are negation of previous life. God is negation, the not-finite or the infinit. 'Tis but the emphasis on negation, the destructiv spirit, that harms.—Rev. Sam Johnson.

THE faculty of imagination is the great spring of human activity, and the principal source of human improvement. As it delights in presenting to the mind scenes and characters more perfect than those which we are acquainted with, it prevents us from ever being completely satisfied with our present condition, or with our past attainments, and engages us continually in the pursuit of some untried enjoyment or some ideal excellence. Hence the ardor of the selfish to better their fortunes and to add to their personal accomplishments; and hence the zeal of the patriot and the philosopher to advance the virtue and the happiness of the human race. Destroy this faculty, and the condition of man will become as stationary as that of the brutes.—Dugald Stewart.

BY "eternal" I mean always-existent—never commencing and never ending. Life is, like all forces, convertible and interchangeable, but never created or destroyed. Force or energy in a moving mass of matter is called mechanical, and in a moving animal nerve force or muscular energy. Mechanical energy may be converted into heat, and heat into mechanical energy, but nothing is lost or created in either case—only changed or transmuted. The heat of the sun seems to be the great source of all energy, and consequently of life, and therefore affinity, gravity, and all forces we know of are only transmuted sunshine, and the great orb of day is really the god of light and life, and all that livs, moves, and has a being on earth is suncreated, or conserved sunbeams.—Elmina D. Slenker

SONG OF THE ÆSTHETES.

My lank limp lily, my long lithe lily,
My languid lily-love, fragil and thin,
With dank leaves dangling and flower-flap chilly,
That shines like the shin of a Highland gilly!
Mottled and moist as a cold toad's skin!
Lustrous and leper-white, splendid and splay!
Art thou not utter and wholly akin
To my own wan soul, and my own wan chin,
And my own wan nose, tip-tilted to sway
The peacock's feathers, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny, yesterday?

My long lithe lily, my languid lily,
My lank limp lily-love, how shall I win—
Woo thee to wink at me? Silver lily,
How shall I sing to thee, softly or shrilly?
What shall I weave for thee—which shall I spin—
Rondel, or rondeau, or virelay?
Shall I buzz like bee, with my face thrust in Thy choice chaste chalice? or choose me a tin
Trumpet? or touchingly, tenderly play
On the weird bird-whistle, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny, yesterday?

My languid lily, my lank limp lily,
My long lithe lily-love, men may grin—
Say that I'm soft and supremely silly;
What care I while you whisper stilly?
What care I while you smile? Not a pin.
While you smile, while you whisper, 'tis sweet to decay!
I hav watered with chlorodin, tears of chagrin,
The churchyard mold I hav planted thee in,
Upside down, in an intense way,
In a rough, red flower-pot, sweeter than sin,
That I bought for a halfpenny, yesterday.

HIGH-PRICED BEANS.

Tom Watrous, commercial traveler, stopped off at the Marshall, Mich., eating-house several years ago.

He was not very hungry, and called for a plate of beans, which he received. He inquired the price and was informed that it was seventy-five cents.

"That's a thundering price for beans," said Tom.

"That's the price," said the proprietor.

The train was just starting; Tom paid the bill, and the coaches bore him and his indignation on toward Detroit.

This was on Saturday. On Monday, Gilmore, the eating-house man, received a telegram, collect on delivery, $1.25, which he paid, and read on opening it, "A thundering price for beans."

Thirty days from that date a neat express package was handed in to Gilmore, C. O. D., who paid ninety cents for the privilege of opening it to discover a lot of sawdust, on the top of which lay a slip of paper with the cabalistic symbols, "A thundering price for beans!"

Two months from this Gilmore was summoned to Chicago to meet a former business partner; the hotel clerk handed him a letter conveying the pleasant information, "A thundering price for beans!"

During Gilmore's absence his son paid for two telegrams and one express package, all bearing directly on the subject of 75 cents being "A thundering price for beans!" Cost of these articles, $3.80. A genuin telegram from Gilmore's mining share broker advising him to sell was refused, and the loss of it entailed an actual damage to Gilmore of $1,500.

A year rolled away. Gilmore ordered a case of Mackinac trout from Detroit. They came C. O. D., $13.83; when opened he found every fish had been removed from the ice and sawdust, and a shingle met his eyes, marked with a blue lead pencil, "A thundering price for beans!" Trouble arose between Gilmore and the Detroit fish house, and they went to law, Gilmore winning the suit, $25 damages, and all at a cost for the attorney's services of $86.90.

Gilmore grew dejected. Life looked gloomy. Letters poured in on every one of his family at regular intervals from all parts of the world, bearing the unpleasant information that it was "a thundering price for beans!"

At last Gilmore sold the Marshall eating-house and moved to Chicago. He carried his deep affliction along wih him, gnawing like a cancer at his vitals. The persecution never ceased, Gilmore drooped, faded, and finally died. The terribly afflicted family followed him to his last resting-place, and the widow, with what little money she had saved from the expenses of bogus telegrams and express packages, erected a plain marble slab to the memory of the tortured Gilmore.

The following Sabbath the mourning family went out to the cemetery to plant some violets on Gilmore's grave. Arriving on the ground, they observed in silent horror that another legend appeared above the name of Gilmore, on the tombstone. It was chalked on a small blackboard and read:

A THUNDERING PRICE FOR BEANS.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

Notes and Clippings.

AN Indiana revivalist givs a chromo to every convert.

AT Kansas City, Hell's Half-Acre Mission takes its title from the neighborhood in which it is situated.

Two Toronto rectors of the church of England read lessons last Sunday from the revised New Testament.

THE first religious body to formally adopt the revised New Testament was the Congregational Association of Marlboro, Mass., but the vote was afterward reconsidered.

A ST. LOUIS divine, eminent enough to hav D.D. attached to his name, declares that those newspapers which do not suppress reports of Ingersoll's lectures are enemies of Christianity.

A NEW sect of Adventists hav sprung up in Indiana. They are called Soul Sleepers, and believe that the body sleeps till the resurrection, the soul being in a state of quiescence till that time.

A CONTEMPORARY is responsible for the statement that Miss Blood, Lord Colin Campbell's bride, is daughter of Victoria Woodhull, who thus becomes a connection of "the Lornes" and Queen Victoria.

THE season of ocean travel is now at its hight. Thousands of poor immigrants are flocking here to America to make fortunes, and thousands of rich emigrants are rushing off to Europe to spend them.

"IF the sharp practices of which I hav heard a little," said the Rev. Dr. Lorimer, in the Baptist Missionary Union, "are at all prevalent in the foreign mission fields, we shall very soon hav to send missionaries to the missionaries."

THE town of Hampden, Massachusetts, has given the land for a cemetery, dividing it equally between Protestants and Roman Catholics. This is said to be the first time that any public property has ever been given to Roman Catholics in New England.

WIFE-BEATERS command a kind of respect in Chicago, judging by the case of Edward Bourasa, who was fined only $2 by the justice, on his explanation that she deserved the chastisment; and she paid the fine, remarking that her husband knew what was best for her.

THE Springfield Republican warns all men who liv by daily work not to count too much on the present "boom" of employment lasting, and reminds them that the great immigration is daily adding to the number of those ready and willing to work at cheap rates, who make work the harder to get by multiplying those who want it.

RICHARDS was esteemed one of the most pious and religious men in St. Louis, and took a prominent part in church affairs, while at the same time he had two wives and two sets of children in different parts of the city; but when he discarded the unrecognized wife, and she threatened exposure, he committed suicide rather than face public opprobrium.

THE Roman Catholic clergy of St. Louis are enforcing anew the rule of the church against secret societies, particularly against the Legion of Honor, a new organization. On the other hand, the Catholic Order of Foresters, a secret society, is countenanced in Massachusetts by Archbishop Williams, and each court has a Roman Catholic priest as a chaplain.

ONE of the accusations brought against the Jews of England by Mr. Goldwin Smith and other Liberals of the same stripe was that they sympathized, as a body, during the Russo-Turkish conflict, with the debased Turk, and not with the Christian Russian. Perhaps the latest telegrams from Russia will furnish some explanation for this remarkable conduct on the part of the English Jews.

THE supreme court of the state of Maine has decided that "a church is not a corporation with authority to create debt in erecting a house of worship." If this interpretation of law were to prevail throughout the country it would revolutionize the church-building business by putting it on a cash basis, and cutting off so much of it as is now managed on trust.

THE Rev. Prof. Swing in a late sermon embraced the theory that when we die here we are in some way transferred to some other planet, and go right on living. The Professor does not take any stock in the conventional angel of the old masters. "There is little probability," he told the astonished grain operators last Sunday week, "that there are intelligent beings having wings."

THE Rev. Henry N. Wright, who is suing the trustees of the Northville Congregational Church of Northville for his salary, recently obtained from Justice Gilbert, in Brooklyn, an order requiring the defendants to furnish a bill of particulars in connection with the charge that he used threatening, indecent, and untruthful language, and had been guilty of disgraceful, immoral, and dishonest conduct, thus destroying his usefulness as a minister in Northville.

TRULY the Puritan is all-conquering! Under a new Sunday law in Alexandria, Va., one Sunday newspaper has suspended publication, the carrier of another paper was fined $7 for delivering it on Sunday, a confectioner was fined $2 for a Sunday delivery of ice cream, and a man who was offering fish for sale on the wharf on the same day paid $4 fine. The citizens are said to be rebellious, and the old style New England Sunday is not likely to be maintained there.

MURAT HALSTEAD is not pleased with the revised New Testament. In the opinion of this editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, a revision that retains not only obsolete forms of words, but spurious passages, and even a spurious book—the book of Revelations—is "hardly likely to satisfy the critical spirit of our times." Moreover, he wonders at the conduct of the American revisers in binding themselvs not to bring out an improved New Testament for fourteen years to come.

MISS GORDON CUMMING, in her book, "At Home in Fiji," says that the cannibals of those islands are a fine, manly race, superior to all other Polynesians. As a rule, they are christened out of the New Testament, but some of the old heathen names still survive, such as "Blood-Drinker," "Eats Like a God," "Not Quite Cooked," "More Dead Man's Flesh," and "One Who Quiets" (with a club). The benediction uttered when one sneezes is "May you club some one," or, "May your wife hav twins."

A LONDON paper tells us that the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistants had some misgivings in tackling Mr. Bradlaugh on the floor of the House. The honorable member is one of the most stalwart and muscular men on either the Liberal or Conservativ benches, and in a physical struggle in which he chose to put forth his strength would be a match for any half dozen of the "waiters" whom the Sergeant can call to his aid. Mr. Bradlaugh dragged a couple of these waiters along the floor the other night with the ease with which a transatlantic liner under way may occasionally be seen dragging a couple of diminutiv steam tugs.

THE sun came out of the clouds after the late cloudiness and gloominess with a spotted face. The spots are growing larger and increasing in number. Peeping around the eastern edge of his disk recently were the outlaying specks and faculæ of yet another great oncoming group. The astronomers hav made it uncomfortable enough with their theories about sun spots and the weather. But the nervous may feel thankful that the early astrologers were not armed with telescopes. If they had known how freckled the sun's face is at times they would hav constructed more horrible horoscopes than the modern Raphaels and Zadkiels ever dreamed of.

THE Troy Presbytery has suspended from the ministry the Rev. Sidney M. Stray, for several years stationed in Warrensburgh, Warren county. About three years ago Mrs. Stray was dangerously wounded by a bullet discharged from a pistol in her husband's hands, and for a long time her life hung upon a thread. While suffering from the injury she declared that the shooting was accidental, but she has recently admitted that her husband attempted to kill her, hence his suspension. Mr. Stray has confessed that he was guilty of adultery with several members of his congregation. The accused clergyman has gone West with the intention of settling in Kansas.

THE funeral sermon by the pastor of the African Methodist Episcopal church at Marion, O., over the remains of an aged brother of the congregation, was highly eulogistic. Brother Hiwarden rose and said that, while he believed in dealing gently with the faults of the dead, he really must protest against a miserable old sinner being set up as a saint. A son of the dead man knocked the critic down, and a general melee ensued, in which brother Hiwarden was slashed with a razor. Brother Thomas was thrown over the back of a pew, breaking his leg. Four of the combatants were subsequently fined $5 each by the mayor, and a fifth, having used brass nuckles, was indicted by the grand jury. Who drew the razor was not discovered.

BISHOP LITTLEJOHN says that the separation of church and state in England is further off than it was ten years ago. While he regards the religious condition of the continent of Europe as anything but prosperous, he sees a large gain to vital godliness in the condition of the church of England. He believes that this is proved by the expenditure, within the last thirty years, of over $200,000,000 in building and repairing churches and cathedrals, and in spending $30,000,000 in eleven years in the establishment and maintenance of church schools. During his stay in England, Bishop Littlejohn spent much of his time with eminent dignitaries of the church, and had large opportuuity for seeing what is actually going on in ecclesiastical work there.

REMARKABLE electrical phenomena are added to the earthquakes, floods, storms, and comets that hav already made this a year of marvels. Over a week ago some of the people of Brooklyn were startled by an enormous fire-ball that is said to hav exploded in the air over the city with a deafening report. On Sunday a similar fireball burst with great noise close by the new statue of Gen. Kearney in Newark. Strange forms of lightning hav been seen in England of late. Many scientific men trace a close connection between the excited condition of the sun and electrical displays on the earth. As the sun has not yet reached the culmination of its period of disturbance, yet more startling outbursts of nature's forces in our atmosphere are likely to be witnessed during the coming summer.

THE most recent case of Christian intolerance is the expulsion by the General Assembly of the Scotch Free church, of Prof. W. Robertson Smith, of Aberdeen University, for the honest expression of his opinions on Liberal and scientific subjects. The debate upon the question of the expulsion occupied the Assembly for six hours, and the vote in favor of dismissal when finally taken stood 449 to 218. So the Professor stands as a condemed heretic, although he is a very able scholar and one of the best Bible students of the times. The church felt that it could not accept his heterodox views, and it will also find it can ill afford to reject him on account of his views. They will by this means be advertised far more widely and be more carefully read than had nothing been said about them.

News of the Week.

GRANT has come out for Conkling.

"COMMODORE" Nutt, the dwarf, is dead.

THERE arrived at Castle Garden last week 21,171 immigrants.

CAMPANINI, the Italian tenor, sailed for Europe last Saturday.

ANTI-JEWISH riots are prevailing in South Russia, necessitating the use of troops to quell them.

THE bicyclists had their first annual parade in Boston on the 20th. About eight hundred were in line.

THE Police Commissioners hav begun their defense before the Mayor on the charge of dereliction of duty in not cleaning the streets.

FOUR men were buried under a pile of bricks and mortar by the falling of a chimney in this city last Monday. Two of them were killed.

GEN. THOMAS D. HOXSEY, a prominent Greenbacker of New Jersey, died on the 30th. He was twice candidate for governor of his state.

COMMANDER GORRINGE declines to undertake the task of keeping our streets clean under the provisions of the bill passed by the Legislature.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT'S statue was presented to the city and unveiled in Madison square on the 25th. Many government officials were present at the ceremony.

AT the recent sale of the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng's library Kempis's "Christian Faith and Progress" sold for the same price as a volume of Col. Ingersoll's lectures.

THE O'Leary belt, for which the pedestrians were contending in this city last week, was won by Vint, a Brooklyn shoemaker, who made 578 miles, the best score on record.

SECRETARY BLAINE was in this city last week, but said his visit had no connection with the senatorial fight at Albany. The Sun tried to start a story that he was implicated in the Star Route steal, but the canard fell flat.

Two passengers were killed, several mortally wounded, and about a dozen severely hurt by the wrecking of a train on the Pennsylvania road at Bear Swamp, five miles east of Trenton, on the 30th, caused by a misplaced switch.

Two thousand iron workers went on a strike this week in Cincinnati for an increase in wages of 30 per cent, and about a thousand mechanics in Troy, N. Y., followed their example on the 30th. In this city the car drivers threatened a strike, but were prevented by the companies giving them a small advance.

THE stalwart branch of the Republican party in the legislature called a caucus on Tuesday, but were unable to get a quorum. The result of the squabble will probably be a deadlock and the electiou of United States Senators will go over to next fall. The administration is too much for Conkling, and he doesn't get "vindicated" very fast.

DECORATION DAY was very generally observed as a holiday in this vicinity by parades of the militia and processions of the Grand Army of the Republic and civic societies. The day was also used as an opening day by many of the yacht and boat clubs located near the city. At Jerome Park the season's races were inaugurated by an exceptionally brilliant turnout.

THE steamer Victoria sunk on the Thames, near London, Ont., on the 24th, carrying down with her about 600 excursionists, 230 of whom were drowned. The rest swam and waded ashore. The boat was overloaded, and upon the passengers rushing to one side to see a race the boiler was thrown out of place, carrying away the deck stanchions and precipitating the crowd upon each other and the whole into the water.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER VII.

"When I came to Alamontada one afternoon I found him in bed. An unusual gladness beamed in his countenance. He smiled at me. Never before had I seen him smile.

"'Thou seemest to feel well to-day,' said I to him. 'Oh, very well. The swelling of my feet extends to my hips, and the physician shook his head doubtfully. He may, therefore, no longer keep the enemy away which he calls death and I call life.'

"'Diest thou then so willingly, Alamontada?'

"He looked at me at this question with an indescribable gentleness; in his looks was reflected the restrained fire of his heart.

"'How?' spoke he. 'When the friendly moment appears that takes from my weary limbs the heavy iron chains and leads me out of the gloomy dungeon and out of the sad, strange realm back into the loved home, shall I then tremble? Who on earth yet loves the forgotten Alamontada? No eye will melt in tears over his dead body. I leave no loved object behind which could make my return to my fatherly home difficult.'

"'And thy paternal home, where is that, Alamontada?'

"'It is there where I shall again be with my own; where I again, in the great family of the Almighty, appear as a child, not as a step-child, and where I am with all created beings. This globe also belongs to the dominion of the eternal; but here I was cast out into misery, and no one knew me, no soul greeted me as brother soul.'

"'Knowest thou, then, Alamontada, knowest thou it certain that after the hour of death yet hours of life await thee? Mayest thou with unshaken conviction close thine eyes? Thou it hast been who confessed to me that no revealed religion comforted thee. How mayest thou, without higher revelation, know thy lot after death? Yet I will not with doubts disturb thy inmost peace.'

"'Truly,' answered Alamontada, 'this peace no doubt can break. I myself stand there where those stood who to the childlike human race gave revelation without having received it. Man, in his perfection, needs no supernatural vision in order to feel in the homelike universe at home. Only the blind must be guided by a strong hand; to him the street remains dark, although a thousand suns may shine.'

"'But when is man in his perfection?' asked I.

"'As soon as he has equally trained all his faculties and knows how to value and use them rightly!' replied Alamontada. 'He who would want to walk on his hands and work with his feet would justly be called a fool. So likewise is he a fool who with his power of imagination would measure eternity; or he who substitutes emotions for moral laws; or he who denies what has been because it has escaped his memory; or does not believe in a future because it has not yet been; or doubts a God, for whose existence there are as many or as few proofs as for the existence of our own self. Powerful is man, and great and godlike in his own sphere of life. But the false direction, the erroneous use of his power, makes him infirm. He sometimes wants to hear with his eyes and see with his ears. That he cannot. Then he weeps over the misery of human existence and accuses the world and its founder. Everywhere he misses truth, and yet he alone is to blame for that.'

"I felt struck with these words. I disclosed myself to the wise man without reserve; acquainted him with my disease, this fearful doubting, which destroyed all my peace.

"'Do you doubt all,' spoke he smiling, 'even that you doubt? You find nowhere in the world certainty, consequently also not therein that it is you who cannot find certainty?'

"'No!' cried I; 'that I am there I cannot deny without being insane; that besides me there are other things is also certain. But what they are, why I am—that I know not.

"'How do you know that you are? Who has revealed it to you?'

"'I feel, I think, and upon that I conclude that something feels and thinks, and this something is myself. Something impresses me, independent of the workings of my imagination; I, therefore, hav no cause to doubt the existence of other things. But those objects I do not know, only their workings upon my senses. Again, I cannot comprehend the connection between my soul and the outer world. I find, the longer I study nature, that the impressions produced upon me by objects without will by no means justify me to determin upon their nature, but that the nature of their impression is the result of my incomprehensible organization.'

"'Ah! dear sir,' said Alamontada, 'if man were not concerned about higher and more beautiful secrets, the knowledge of the things surrounding him would only slightly occupy him. But with pleasure I will follow your thoughts. That which through my whole life afforded entertainment to my desolate hours shall also sweeten the last weeks, or days, or hours, of my existence. I agree with you that to me the causes of things, which I call world, dwell in secret darkness; that I really only liv in an imaginary world, which shapes all things after the law of my disposition. But also in this must I, after just these laws, distinguish the working cause from the effect. I, consequently, see the universe divided into two parts; a world full of phenomena, or impressions on me, and this alone it is that I know; another world full of working, in themselvs unknown causes, which I recognize through their effects; to these belong myself, or, if you will, my soul, which itself produces appearances. So I, it is true, of the immense clock-work of the universe see only the outside, only the dial, but dark and a riddle remains the interior and the lofty artist.'

"'Thou speakest,' said I, 'thou speakest of causes and effects, but knowest thou also whether it is that way in the universe? Who vouches for that, that everything be not otherwise than thou art compelled to imagin it to thyself? How, if the whole universe would be no more or no less than a necessary consequence of thy organization, as the rose is the necessary result of the inner construction of the rose-bush.

"'To that,' replied my philosopher, 'only one answer can be given: either will I make use of my power of intellect, and then I must think in obedience to its laws, or I will not judge according to the dictation of my reason—will let something irrational take the lead of the rational, and then ends all investigation, and insanity takes the place of it. The language of the latter I do not understand, as little as it understands itself. As long, therefore, as I am man, that is, so long as I hav reason, do I talk reasonable, and the doubt of insanity cannot move me. I talk only of the world as I hav it, not of that whereof I hav no proof, no trace, no presage, and what is nowhere for me, except in a freak of my fancy.

"'Enough; I know that I am, although insanity might doubt its own self. I know that other things independent of me work upon me. I am, and am not alone. I share the enjoyment of existence with millions of other beings. I recognize in these millions, beings created like myself, and call them and myself spirits, because they hav the power of free, independent action. I recognize them, like myself, only from their appearances in words and actions. Yet their nature is unknown to me. They belong to the first causes, to those powers which fill the world with their results, though they remain secrets in themselvs.

"'And why must they remain a secret in themselvs?' asked I.

"Upon this he answered: 'That question touches the horizon of our knowledge. I might well answer; just as all nature around us livs and works, and yet is without understanding of its own organization; or just as the single thought springs forth from the human mind, without being able to recognize its own nature, because it is not the origin of itself, but rather an outflow, or, as it were, a part of our own individuality—so, 'tis true, the mind has consciousness, but likewise no perception and knowledge of the real constitution of its own nature, because it also is not the independent source of its own existence, but part or outflow of a higher being. A thought is from this higher being, which human tongues call the primeval cause of all existence, or God. I might say that the limitless all of the spirits, beings, powers, things, is only a unit, an undivided whole, which, to be sure, to the senses or the human imaginativ faculties seems to be divisible, but in reality is not so. The solitary, this all, outside of which nothing else can possibly be thought of, because it in itself is all, has, because it is all, alone in the highest consciousness the understanding of itself. We other spirits, beings, powers, and things are issues of God, without understanding our inner nature, because otherwise we must be able to penetrate and understand the being of God, who is our original being. I could tell you more. But would you understand me? I, also, once impertinently or curiously attempted to leave the circle which nature had drawn around my activity; but soon I felt the vanity of my undertaking. The first step to wisdom and contentment is to acknowledge the impossible; the second, not to wish the impossible. Since it now is foolish to wish the impossible, so must the sacrifice be light, for us to forever and entirely banish the thought thereof, and to be satisfied with what we hav.

"'And that which we possess in the realm of knowledge is sufficient for our contentment. While my spirit revels in the wonders of eternal nature, it recognizes itself as one of the nobler parts thereof. Nature remains; only the forms, the colors, the combinations of things change; but that which lies behind these forms and colors, and what produces these changeable phenomena does not cease. I can, through the power of fire, dissolve a palace into invisible atoms; but with that I hav only discontinued a relation of these small particles to one another, which formerly was called palace; the particles themselvs I hav not wiped out of the universe. The working, unknown powers, the things themselvs, remain; only different phenomena appear now, that is, they make a different impression upon my senses since they sustain another relation to me.

"'Further I do not penetrate; partly because I see everywhere the boundary of my knowledge, partly because I need for my contentment no more than I am permitted to know.'

"'I confess to thee,' said I to Alamontada, 'thy philosophy is very easily satisfied. Mine, I am sorry to say, demands more. It searches for solid, indisputable truth, and finds it nowhere. It seeks certainty about the most important affairs of human nature, and discovers only doubts far and near.'

"'You are unhappy because you wish for more than you are able to accomplish, and foster desires whose passionate voices overpower the more gentle language of reason and the heart. But two ways only we can pursue. Either must we make use of our mental powers as we possess them, or we surrender ourselvs wilfully to the oddest insanity. The latter happens if we, to use an already-employed illustration, demand of the ears that they see colors, of the eyes that they should listen to sounds. It happens when we doubt our freedom and yet hourly make different choices; when we reject all belief and still daily act upon guesses; when we find contentment in nothing but indisputable certainties, and yet in a world full of delusions become wiser even through delusions. So is such a philosopher (if I may call him a lover of wisdom who delights in everlastingly contradicting the laws of his inner being) an unhappy man. He accuses nature, and should only battle against his folly.'

"'But how dost thou explain this,' I asked him, 'that man becomes more inclined to doubt the more he extends his knowledge and purifies his ideas? One would think that researches and study would lead finally to truth, and truth to rest. Why is the contrary always the case? Why are they the most contented, and, if thou wilt, the happiest, who know the least? and why is the pang of constant doubt the reward of the activ researcher? Should this not throw suspicion upon the value of our knowledge and make us disgusted with the strife for higher training of ourselvs, since it tears our most beautiful hopes, destroys our most sacred aims, and with inconsolable night hides the Eden to which our longing aims?

"Alamontada smiled gently and stretched his arms upwards, and his eyes glistened with a joyful ray. 'Over my Eden,' exclaimed he, 'hangs no inconsolable night! I am, and am in the boundless, unexplored all; out of God nothing is lost. My being is one with the being of the universe. It is a primitiv power; out of it I came; the name is upon the tongue of all rational creatures; it breathes longing into every heart; and to every reason it is given to think, to honor it. And that is God! And the thought of God is the dim understanding of our own mysterious being, and the self-esteem of the most virtuous spirit for itself is an adoration of the primitiv source of all that exists.'

"Alamontada had not lost my question. He took it up again after a while.

"'Nothing seems to me more natural,' said he, 'than that man should sink deeper in doubts, the further he hurries after the trace of a truth shining from afar. Idle ignorance only believes everything, doubts nothing. He who breaks loose from it, discovers among ten venerable truths surely nine errors. Abashed by manifold self-deceptions, he becomes full of distrust. Nothing satisfies him any more except solid, indisputable certainty; he finds it nowhere, for everywhere he can add, Under other circumstances everything might be different. Therefore superstition and Infidelity mix immediately together. The chair of St. Peter at Rome bore the first Atheists of Christendom. Between night and day lies twilight; between error and wisdom the tormenting twilight of doubt.'

"'But why languish so many in this fog, and do not find their way out into the light?' asked I between.

"'Perhaps,' said he, 'many a one lacks courage; he remains standing, instead of going forward in a straight direction; another, who loves the dreams of his childhood, shudders before the uncommon form of truth, and returns in old age whence he came. I knew in my youth many a penitent Atheist.

"'Still others seek the light by false ways, that is, instead of marching onward they turn about in the circle of their doubts. They want proof of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. In order to make this discovery they begin vain examinations about the nature of things, of the powers of which we perceive only the result, not the powers themselvs. They want to find out what God is in himself, and what the soul is in itself, whilst they in consequence of their nature can perceive only the phenomena of them. After fruitless efforts they stand in the twilight again in their old place, and despair to escape from the labyrinth.

"'Others again choose the way of similitude of things; they explain to themselvs how, under certain conditions in the world of bodies, the things work. The deeper they penetrate into the secrets of nature the more they resolve the bodies into their primitiv elements, the simpler they find the code of the universe, after which everything existing works upon the other, attracts the other, disunites and mechanically or chemically forms new things. That man thinks, perceives, and wills, and acts, that he can compute the course of circumrotation of the heavenly bodies and understands the laws of fermenting nature, these also they consider to be the result of his organization, as blossom and fruit are the natural result of the organization of the plant. Destroy the root of the plant, cry they, and blossom and fruit fall. So with man's spirit. What hav they taught us about it? They explain from unknown things that we shall never understand the unknown, which we would like to know. For the powers which produce those phenomena that we call bodies remain a riddle, or they want from phenomena to explain a something and its fate, which is itself neither phenomenon nor body, but pure working power; I mean the human mind. They, in fine, make the body the father of the mind, that which was put together for the thought, the origin of the simple, the changeable the basis of the unchangeable, that which is unconscious of itself, the creator of the self-conscious; in short, man a clockwork, an automation, and preach for glory's sake an inversion of all that is reasonable, which they would not in earnest like to believe.

"'But with the greatest number the disease of doubt probably originates from the wrong use of their mental faculties in treating this great subject. They want to accomplish with their fancy that which reason only is capable to do. They want to represent by pictures that which can only be imagined, as also mathematical points and lines can only be in imagination. While reason works, the fancy, unnoticed, shoves pictures under the clear ideas, and the deceived philosopher takes the one for the other, and despairs at the last to succeed in his cause. That is the reason that this disease is found mostly among young men of your age, my dear abbé, where one steps from the play-ground of fancy into the workshop of understanding, loving both and suffering both to work, and where then the first works of our self-acting become strange, though sometimes beautiful deformities.'"

"Now, that hits you both!" said Dillon smiling.

Roderick pressed his hand and said: "The old slave is right in many things. But one must hear his words two or three time in order to fully fathom their meaning."

"I desire greatly," said I, "to become acquainted with the man's own convictions, in order to learn whether they will crowd out or confirm my own."

"Be it so!" answered Dillon. "Let us at some other time read Alamontada's conversations as noted down by me, and now to the point. We shall now hear from him, what he thinks of his spirit and its fate, and why we should think thus and not otherwise."

Dillon skipped a few books, drew forth one of the last ones, and read.

Janus is identical with Jannes, Joannes, Hoannes Aunnes, Dag Aun, Dagon, Hoan, No-ah, and as the linga (upright stone) was the symbol of this personage he is also referred to as the Rock, Lapes, also Cephas, Petros, Peter; he also holds the keys of hell (Annwn) and heaven (Hevin).

The sun, passing through Aquarius, is held to be Joannes in the desert, and prepares the way for the spring advent. He is also Noah, and with the ark is supposed to preserve the germinating principle of all plants and animals in safety through the floods of Aquarius, the time occupied from the ingress of the sun into Aquarius till the advent of Dovydh (the civilizer) in March, averaging forty days in the watery signs Aquarius and Pisces. This is the origin of Lent. The advent into Taurus, the impregnator, was observed by the ancients, who decorated their oxen with garlands and led them to the temples, perpetuated to this day by the observance of Palm Sunday and Easter, when the eggs are dyed and ornamented, symbolic of the mundane egg (earth) being sanctified by the impregnation of Hü, the sun-god.

His ascension into heaven in Aries has been confused with his resurrection upon Christmas day, and his death has been placed upon Friday, Good Friday. In six days he completed his work, resting upon the seventh, according to Genesis. In the later sacrificial idea he is crucified upon the sixth, so as not to prejudice the Jewish Sabbath or seventh day. In the Druidic mythology he dies upon the gallows in September, the seventh month. This is represented by the ⊼ which is the form of the cromlechs, several of which stand to the present hour as monuments of these ideas which were extant at some long-forgotten period when the human race was in its infancy. In later myths Sagittarius is represented by a centaur, half man, half horse, and the sun was said to be born in or near a stable, as the constellations Sagittarius and Capricorn overlap each other.

This idea is also carried out on a smaller scale in the days of the week. Thus the first day of the week is dedicated to Hü and is perpetuated as sun-day, while the last or seventh day is dedicated to Said Wrn, or Saturn, or Satan, symbolic of September. Later, when the courses of the planets were understood, planetary names were given to the days of the week, Sunday, Moon Day, Tuiscour. Mars gave the name to Tuesday or Mardi. Mercury, or Wodin, givs the name to Wednesday; Mercredi-Jehovah, Jove, Jupiter, or Thor, equivalent to Hü in Leo, Lion of the tribe of Judah, givs the name to Thursday; Jeudi or Jovedi, while Friga-Venus-Gwener givs a name for Friday, Vendredi. Saturn is perpetuated in Saturday; Samedi Gwen is the Virgin Morgwen, the sea virgin or Venus Marina. According to the cabalists the same zodiacal signs and planets here indicated governed the days of the week. By what tradition Friday became unlucky I know not, as Venus was held to be a beneficent planet and Virgo a beneficent sign. The belief probably dates from the period when the Christian fathers changed their Sabbath from the seventh day of the week to the first, thus reverting to the old sun-worship. The seventh day being accursed, and also the day before, the Christian Sabbath was confounded with the old idea expressed in the Bible—"Six days shalt thou labor and the seventh keep holy." And as nowhere in the book can any authority for the change of Sabbath be found, there are many good Christians who believe still that Sunday is the seventh day.

Another question arises concerning this Sabbath, which shows how elastic the Christian religion is, and St. Paul's advice to be all things to all men is implicitly followed. Thus the ancient religion of Greece was moon-worship. Diana, their goddess, had the finest temples in the world. To-day the Grecians are called Christians, as they worship her on Monday under the name of Panagia, while lights burn before her pictures in every house. Learned Christian divines tell of a schism and rupture in the churches, but each givs a different cause for it, so probably it was an adaptation of the Christian ideas to the old Diana traditions.

In Rome and her provinces, Spain, Gaul, etc., the pagan priests taught that men who served their country well became after death heroes, demi-gods, and gods, and even while yet alive some of their emperors, such as Domitian and others, were deified. The Christianity of these countries to-day is more saint-worship than anything else. Deified men or patron saints are the prominent traits.

In Ireland and Britain the Druid temples were deemed a fitting foundation on which to raise the superstructure of Christianity; so we see Druidic monuments still standing in the churchyards of the Christians. The Druid festivals were still retained, and the custom of decorating the churches on Christmas day are Druidic, and are observed only where the Keltic race has a foothold.

In Brazil the negroes hav their ideas of a fetich to be worshiped; hence they are allowed to prostrate themselvs before black virgins, black Josephs, and black Christs; and any time during the day showers of rockets may be seen rising from the graveyards at intervals. These are to frighten away the devil who is hovering around ready to seize the departed as soon as his friends resign him to the grave. If they can fill the grave up while the effect of the rockets lasts, the dear departed is supposed to be safe.

Their religious service on Sunday is followed by a fandango, in which males and females participate, and which, through the effects of palm wine and the monotonous music of the tom-tom, degenerates into an orgy of the most revolting character. Can any conceive of anything more similar to the fetish-worship, ideas, and practices of Dahomey than this? And yet it is Christianity!

The devil has played a prominent part in the Christian theology, and is apparently of more consequence to it than the godhead. Sailors and missionaries cannot agree in heathen lands. The missionary forbids the nativs to hav any intercourse with Jack. Jack asserts that the missionary puts the fear of the devil into the nativs and induces them to contribute to him as a mediator who will propitiate the Evil One. Certain it is that the advent of the missionary is the precursor of invasion and annexation to those unfortunate nations who hav admitted them; and it would seem to be more for the purpose of introducing manufactured goods and opening trade than converting the heathen, while the merchants who reap the benefit keep up this fiction and collect the children's pennies in the Sunday-school to pay the expense of opening up the trade. The late fiasco of the Scotch Church Mission in Africa seems to indicate that missionaries hav preferred the rifle and lash as evangelizing agents rather than the gospel of peace.

The devil has served the purpose of an excellent police, and has done more to keep the populace in subjection than any other agency. But a few years ago Materialism became fashionable; London, Paris, and Boston were full of it, and Materialistic literature abounded. So it did at the latter part of the last century. And when it had frittered down to the lowest grades of society, it culminated in the French Revolution and the abolition of religion; while the amateur Infidels of the aristocracy, along with the priests whom they despised, were dragged to the guillotin to the tune of "Ga Ira," and the motto which they so flippantly chanted seemed in a fair way of fulfilment:

"Serrez le con du dernier roi,
Au boyaux du dernier pretre."

So in the present day; while it is fashionable to be very devout just now, the fruits of their fashionable Materialism are showing themselvs in the Socialistic-Nihilistic sentiments of the ignorant populace. While Christianity (sun-worship) as the sun has been darkened, the Greek church (moon-worship) is rapidly turning into blood, and the great lights, the stars of the age, are very pronounced in their Materialism.

If there is no devil, no hereafter, what need of morality? If the populace can circumvent society with its police, there is no more to be feared; and society as expressed by Christianity relies more upon the gallows, the Gattling gun, and the rifle than it does upon its own gospel of peace, and is not at all backward in employing these agencies.

Let us look the devil squarely in the face and see who he is, trace his pedigree, and show him up. In the original Druidic myths he represents simply the cessation of the energy of growth in autumn, and is termed Seithyn Saidi, Said Wrn (Seithyn, i.e., seventh, Saidi, sexual energy; Wrn, resting-place). From Seithyn we hav the word September, which is the equivalent word from the Latin. In the Zend Avesta he is Satan and Ahriman, and in India he is Siva. In the ancient Egyptian language he is Set or Seth or Typhon. And Ebers says of him thus: Typhon, the Egyptian Set, the god of evil and of misfortune, passed through a remarkable transformation in the religious consciousness of the Egyptians. In the earliest ages he was not regarded as a destroying deity. Mariette proves that he was worshiped at Memphis from the fifth dynasty.

The first appearance of a deity of destruction seems to hav been in the time of the Hyksos (shepherd kings), who worshiped him exclusivly. Before this the principle of evil had been personified by the serpent Appe (Scorpio), and Seth had been worshiped as the god of war (Moloch, Mars) and of foreign countries. If their foes were worsted in battle, the Egyptians glorified this deity, but despised and maltreated him if the contrary was the case.

Ramses took pleasure in calling himself a worshiper of Seth, but the succeeding monarchs erased his name wherever they found it. Later the god was universally detested as the principle of destruction. According to Plutarch, he had dominion over all the passionate, ill-regulated, unsteadfast, false, and foolish feelings in the souls of men. In one papyrus he is called the Omnipotent Destroyer and Devastator. The destroying forces of nature are reflected in his being, all noxious plants and destructiv animals were his property, and the capricious and untruthful sea was a part of his dominions. His favorit animals were the stubborn ass, the disgusting hippopotamus, the voracious crocodile, and the wild boar (probably this is the reason why the hog has been forbidden as an article of food in oriental countries). Red was his distinctiv color, in consequence of which people with red hair were called Typhonic, and are said to hav been offered as sacrifices to the deity (Diodorus). Plutarch givs the same account. These human sacrifices, however, ceased to be practiced at a very early period, though red-haired Egyptians were held in contempt and pelted with mud at a much later period.

Obituary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Eber Budlong, after a long and painful illness, passed from earth life on the 17th inst. He was a Liberal Spiritualist in knowledge and belief, an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for a long time Secretary of the Liberal League of this city, and an earnest, faithful worker in the cause.

One of the few requests he made before passing away was that "no minister of the gospel should officiate at his funeral." So his "soul goes marching on" without the aid of any so-called "man of God." Being a Mason, his remains were buried under the auspices of that fraternity, the military company of this city (of which he was once a member) assisting in escorting them to the cemetery, after a few pieces of appropriate music had been nicely sung by a few friends.

He was born in New York state, was a faithful Union soldier during the war, after which he came to this place, filling many positions of responsibility and public trust, being for the last few years employed as chief clerk in the United States revenue office located here.

One of our local daily papers closes a long obituary with the following: "A kind husband and father, a faithful friend, a good citizen, an upright man, he has passed from our midst and leaves a wife and child in tears and grief, relativs to mourn, and a multitude of friends whose heartfelt sympathy goes out to the bereaved ones, and who will ever hold his memory in respect for the virtues which adorned his life." Very truly, A. W. ST. JOHN.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1881.

Rededication of Paine's Monument.

On Monday last, Decoration day, a goodly number of the admirers of Thomas Paine, amounting to several hundreds, assembled at the monument erected to his memory near New Rochelle in 1839. The day was lovely and the meeting was in every way most pleasant. The major portion of those who went out from the city took the 10 A.M. train at the New Haven depot, and a pleasant ride of forty minutes brought us to village of New Rochelle, in Westchester county. Quite a party were in waiting at the depot with numerous omnibuses and other carriages. These were soon filled, and a procession was formed which turned its face toward the monument, nearly two miles north of the station. Capt. Geo. W. Loyd, mounted on a white horse named Button [the same as one once owned by Thomas Paine], acted as marshal and escorted us to the monument.

The lot in the center of which the monument stands is some twenty feet square, surrounded by a wall laid in cement and some three or four feet high, with a tree in each corner affording an agreeable shade. The monument is of Westchester marble, of a light color, and is a straight shaft some twelve feet in hight, including the base and capstone and cornice of Ionic order. It is about three feet square at the base, and tapers to thirty inches or thereabouts next the cap. The whole is profusely lettered on the four sides. On the face, or west side, of the monument is a profile chiseling of Paine by an Italian artist, encircled by a wreath, and over this is the motto:

> The world is my country, and to do good my religion.

Under the profile are the words:

> THOMAS PAINE. Author of "Common Sense." Born in England, January 29, 1737; died in New York city, June 8, 1809.
> The palaces of kings are built on the ruins of the bowers of paradise.
> Erected by public contribution, November 12, 1839.
> Repaired and rededicated May 30, 1881.

On the north side is the following inscription:

> I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man, and that our religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy.—Age of Reason.
> It is necessary to the happiness of man that he be mentally faithful to himself. Infidelity does not consist in believing or in disbelieving; it consists in professing to believe what he does not believe.—Age of Reason.

On the east side the following extracts are cut:

> It is only in the creation that all our ideas and conceptions of a word of God can unite. The creation speaketh an universal language, independently of human speech or human language, multiplied and various as they be. It is an ever-existing original which every man can read. It cannot be forged; it cannot be counterfeited; it cannot be lost; it cannot be altered; it cannot be suppressed. It does not depend upon the will of man whether it shall be published or not: it publishes itself from one end of the earth to the other. It preaches to all nations and to all worlds; and this word of God reveals to man all that is necessary for man to know of God.
> Do we want to contemplate his power? We see it in the unchangeable order by which the incomprehensible whole is governed. Do we want to contemplate his munificence? We see it in the abundance with which he fills the earth. Do we want to contemplate his mercy? We see it in his not withholding that abundance even from the unthankful. In fine, do we want to know what God is? Search not the book called the scripture, which any human hand might make, but the scripture called the creation.—Age of Reason.

The following is on the south side:

> These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis shrink from the service of their country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we hav the glorious consolation with us that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly. Heaven knows how to put a price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.—Crisis No. I.

This is followed by another long extract from "Crisis No. XV."

The monument lot is flush on the White Plains and New Rochelle road, and on the north side runs the road leading to the farmhouse, nearly a quarter of a mile distant on the most elevated portion of the farm.

P. L. McClellan, Esq., of Mount Vernon, was appointed chairman, and for the purpose occupied the veritable arm-chair once used by Paine himself. D. M. Bennett was appointed vice-president, and T. C. Leland and E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., secretaries. The banner of the Fourth New York Liberal League, under whose auspices the repairs to the monument have partially been effected, was seeured to a tree. The speakers occupied while speaking an elevated position under this banner.

The chairman opened the meeting by a very effectiv, neat, and appropriate speech, in which he expressed his appreciation of the honor conferred upon him, and accorded justice to the name of the remarkable man whose memory we met to honor. He then announced T. B. Wakeman as the orator of the day.

Mr. Wakeman held the audience spell-bound for more than an hour, every person present fondly drinking in his eloquent remarks. Besides giving a comprehensiv and interesting biographical view of Thomas Paine from his earliest youth to the time he lay down to rest at nearly seventy-three years of age, and recounting with striking effect the remarkable events in his career, he alluded to the duties of Liberals, admirers of Thomas Paine, in the present hour. He argued that Paine had set us a most worthy example in boldly and cheerfully performing his duty as it was presented to him, and that we should follow this good example and be like Thomas Paine in pressing forward in the work which lies before us, flinching not in our duty in efforts for the good of humanity. He held that as Faith, Hope, and Charity are the three great virtues in the Christian faith, and that the greatest of these is Charity, so the three great virtues in Paine's creed are Liberty, Science, and Humanity, and the greatest of these is Humanity.

But little of Mr. Wakeman's remarks can be given here, but perhaps space may be found for a pretty full report of them in our columns in a week or two.

Mr. J. P. Mendum, the venerable editor of the Boston Investigator, was next called upon, and for about half an hour he interested the audience with appropriate remarks in reference to the man whose teachings he has been giving to the world for nearly half a century, calling attention to the duties which devolve upon the believers of Thomas Paine to-day. He approved of Mr. Palmer's movement to erect in New York a temple of Freethought, where mental liberty can find a home. He hoped every considerable city in the country would follow the example and erect a temple within its precincts sacred to the teachings of Paine, of science, truth, and love of humanity.

Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, was the next speaker. For half an hour he interested the assemblage with his lively and diversified remarks. Somewhat early in his remarks he recited this little poem, with which his hearers seemed much pleased:

ORTHODOXY.

Orthodoxy's getting shaky,
  Hell is losing half its charm,
Beecher's stole the devil's brimstone,
  Churches all are in alarm.

Hell was once a lake infernal,
  Past description, past all name,
Where the damned must roast eternal
  In that lurid brimstone flame.

Hell of late, though, 's getting shorter,
  Cooling off, too—beats the deuce!
Likewise brimstone, once so plenty,
  Now is nearly out of use.

Not long since hell swarmed with infants,
  Doomed to burn by God's decree,
Just because old Eve stole apples
  Off the devil's knowledge tree.

Later still, divines went searching
  Hell all through with anxious care,
Gave the hunt up quite discouraged—
  Not the first d——d baby there!

Fact is, hell's a grand old humbug,
  Poor old Satan's most played out;
Orthodoxy 's out of brimstone,
  Hell's fast going up the spout.

He gave this as his creed, "Damn others as you would like to be damned yourself." He conceived the highest meaning of the word liberty to be to allow every other person to believe what to him seems right, just as freely as you believe yourself. He also repeated the following:

CHRISTIANITY CONDENSED.

Heaven is the home of an orthodox ring,
Where a divine enigma reigns as king,
Where whitewashed souls from this mundane shore
Shall sing hallelujah forever more.

Hell is a howling brimstone pit,
Where poor damned souls forever sit,
And burn and bake and roast and fry,
And are gnawed by worms that never die.

Mankind may avoid that fiery flood
By bathing within the Nazarene's blood.
They can find it where tickets for heaven are sold,
Then walk over hell on a bridge of gold.

No Atheist, Infidel, Pagan, or Jew,
Shall ever acquire the precious boon;
None but the orthodox, rosewater few
Shall dance with the angels in heaven's saloon.

The speaker said that he had four propositions to make: 1. He would giv $100 to any person who would point out any one thing that God ever did and prove it to the satisfaction of any man who did not want to trust hearsay evidence; 2. He would giv the same amount to anybody who would prove that there was a personal God, or point out his habitation; 3. He would giv the same amount to any person who believes there is a God if he can explain why he believes it in the sense of personal evidence; 4. He would giv $10,000 to any man who would show that the Holy Ghost was anything but gas.

He said: "Holy means healthy. That is the etymological meaning of the word. Ghost, by the same authority, means gas. Holy Ghost means healthy gas. That is all you can make of it. A spirit is gas, and I defy contradiction. It is a scientific fact that is undeniable. Therefore, if God is a spirit, he is a bundle of gas, and gas is destructible; hence spirit is not immortal. Anything, any form, is substance, and occupies space, else it would not be substance. All substances are in themselvs destructible. Hence I claim that the Holy Ghost and God, as worshiped by the orthodox, is nothing but healthy gas. I don't worship gas. I worship what I see that is good. I don't worship man or woman. If I were to worship man, next to Thomas Paine, I should worship Robert Ingersoll. He is the greatest man in the world to-day, because he is freeing men's minds from the chains that bound their bodies when Thomas Paine began his work. Paine was the champion of freedom in man. He was the first man who ever wrote 'The United States of America.' Ingersoll is doing for the mind what Paine could not do." The speaker was at times loudly applauded.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, of this city, was next called upon, and for a few minutes explained his plan and motivs for the erection of a temple of freedom in this city. He thought Freethought and science should hav a home where a platform should be free for any and all forms of Liberalism—where even the most radical thought could be freely expressed. He wished to see a large hall erected capable of holding one of Ingersoll's largest audiences, with a smaller hall that would accommodate audiences of five hundred—an edifice that would be to the Liberal thought of the city what the Cooper Institute is, without the narrowness and exclusivness that has been exhibited there on some occasions.

He believed the project a practicable one, and that at least one in five of the Liberal people living in and near New York could take from one to ten shares each, at twenty-five dollars per share. He believed the investment might be made a remunerativ one, so that no person who put money into the enterprise need to lose a cent. He explained that no part of the money would be called for until the whole stock—$100,000 for the ground, and $150,000 for the edifice—is taken, when the stockholders will hold a meeting, elect officers, and proceed to business. He stated that he had headed the list with $1,000, and would be pleased to confer with those who feel interested in the movement. His address is No. 151 East 18th street, New York.

Mr. S. P. Putnam, of this city, next addressed the audience in a series of most earnest, eloquent, and appropriate remarks bearing upon the duties devolving upon the lovers of truth at this period of the world's history. His remarks gave the best of satisfaction, and he was heartily applauded.

Miss Ella M. Hart, daughter of Mr. Joseph Hart, of Wilmington, Del., next read a beautiful poem commemorativ of the life work of Thomas Paine. It was well rendered, and highly appreciated by the audience.

Mrs. H. Allen next read the following beautiful tribute to the man whom we met together to honor:

"It will be seen by the life and writings of Thomas Paine that he was a correct thinker, a ready writer, with a heart free from guile but overflowing with benevolence; firm in purpose and untiring in pursuits, he warmly espoused the cause of liberty and human rights, and he defended his cause with such force of argument and eloquence that he bore down all opposition. With a mind as capacious as the universe, and a perception as quick as thought, he could grasp the most extensiv subjects, and discover their most abstruse bearings; he could discover truth, and always espoused her cause, which was one reason why, in debate, he always put his adversary to flight. He erected a monument that will be more durable than brass, and more precious than rubies. When conquering heroes shall be forgotten; when the rich and noble of the earth shall be laid low in the dust; when the proud obelisk and triumphal arch shall molder and decay, there shall liv with grateful remembrance in the hearts of his countrymen the name of Thomas Paine."

Several calls were here made for D. M. Bennett to say something. He was not charged with a speech, but said he was much pleased to meet here this beautiful day with this hearty, enthusiastic assemblage to do honor to the memory of one of the most remarkable and worthy men which the last two centuries hav produced. Over forty years ago the private subscriptions of admiring friends erected this beautiful monument on this the farm once owned by Paine. The rude hands of the vandal and the relic-hunter having greatly defaced the appearance of the monument, we hav reason to be grateful to the kind friends from all parts of the country who hav sent in their dollars to pay for the repairs which hav fully restored it to its original beauty. "While standing here, close to the monument," said he, "I wish to pass a vote of thanks to the kind friends who hav contributed to the beautifying of this monument and these grounds. Will you unite with me in giving this vote?" "Yes, yes," was heard from several persons. "Let all, then, in favor of giving a vote of thanks to the kind friends whose donations hav paid for these repairs, join in giving three sonorous ayes." Three hearty and enthusiastic ayes arose from every throat, when the speaker pronounced the vote unanimous.

Mr. Bennett spoke a few words in praise of Mr. Palmer's movement toward erecting a temple of freedom. "It is a needed and worthy object," he said, "and should be carried into execution. Every Liberal of us should feel interested in this proposition and all do what we can to make it a success. Every person who contributes to the work will not only be doing good, but will undoubtedly receive fair returns upon the investment. It is not a gift that is called for, but we are asked to take stock in an enterprise that will be an honor to us and will be a source of profit. I deem this a fitting time, while standing right here by this monument of Thomas Paine, to agitate this matter and to begin to take stock in this enteprise. I wish to take one hundred dollars' worth of stock in this temple of freedom and will take more if I find my condition will admit of it. Are there not others standing here who also wish to take stock in this proposed temple? If so, friends, speak out now and let us know it. It is a very proper time to begin this good work." Responses soon rose from the audience on all sides, some subscribing for one share and some for two shares. In a short time over forty shares were subscribed by those present. Thus a good beginning was made in a very laudable undertaking, which it is hoped may find responses in various parts of the country.

Mr. Wright, of Elmira, N. Y., an eloquent speaker, made the closing remarks, after which the chairman, thanking the speakers who had contributed to the edification of those present, dismissed the audience, some to partake of the collation which had been provided, some to visit the farmhouse on the hill where Paine is said to hav once lived, and some to return by the first train to the city. Those of us who visited the farmhouse were permitted by the genial proprietor of the farm, Mr. See, to visit the room where Paine used to sit and read and write, with the same fire-place and the same antique andirons where he once used to warm himself. After drinking freely of the water of the well, and sitting awhile on the grass in the shade of apple-trees, we wended our way back to the station and were soon on our way to the city, all feeling that we had enjoyed a very pleasant day, and that we would like to see returns of the same on every succeeding year.

Round-the-World Fund.

We wish to return our grateful thanks to our numerous friends who hav so promptly responded to their pledges to the fund to carry us round the world. We are more than proud we hav such a large number of friends who show their generosity in such a tangible, serviceable manner. We can never forget the kindness that has been shown us.

We will take this occasion to say that there are some two hundred friends to be heard from who hav pledged, and we would carefully hint to them that the sooner they send in the little "V's" promised the sooner we will be able to start upon our travels. The time is growing short, and as we will be pretty sure to need every dollar that is pledged, we hope none will be bashful or particularly backward. "A wink is as good as a nod."

Liberty and Purity.

This pamphlet, of nearly one hundred pages, by T. B. Wakeman, by the above title, has been reduced to the low price of fifteen cents. It is the property of the National Defense Association, and this body is in need of funds to meet and fight such cases as the enemies of Liberalism from time to time impose upon us. There is probably no better way for those who are willing to render aid to the Association than to buy from one to a dozen copies to distribute gratuitously where they will do good by imparting valuable information where most needed. Those who order copies of this able argument, and giv them wide distribution, will do good in two ways. First, by aiding the National Defense Association; second, by disseminating the best kind of reading matter. Single copies, 15 cents, or eight copies for $1.

Postscript to W. H. B.'s Article.

[By an error, this postscript to the reply to "A Hater of Shams" was omitted in its proper place, and so we giv it here:]

This article is longer than I wished to make it, though shorter by a third than the critic's. I forbear to notice a number of his points, which are irrelevant, or to correct some others of his errors of fact. The discussion of the Paine-Junius question would be agreeable enough to me but for the constant necessity of correcting my adversaries' errors. That is a painful task, especially as it leads to personalities. The gentleman from Connecticut is courteous enough, but if he writes again I insist that he giv his name or initials, and that he be brief. But I would rather end the discussion here. B.

The Physiologist.

We are glad to be able to announce that this valuable and plucky monthly has again made its appearance, and is again allowed the same freedom enjoyed by other periodicals—an unimpeded transit through the mails. The order from the department which a few weeks ago deprived it of the rights of the mail belonging in common to all publishers has now been revoked.

The June number is out, and looks as bright as a polished diamond. It will hardly prove a sugar-plum to the postal department, for it is largely composed of the extracts from numerous papers which hav given expression to the indignation felt at the tyrannous rulings of our governmental servants. May this be the last instance of this kind to take place in what should be free America.

This is a good time to make up the loss which the Physiologist has sustained by these troubles. The subscription price is $1.50 per year. Address S. H. Preston, publisher, 209 west Thirty-fourth street, New York.

The Banner of Light of May 28th contains the following mild and just rebuke of a lying, slanderous sheet published in Chicago:

We pronounce the Religio-Philosophical Journal an unreliable sheet. It has traduced us for months; it has slandered some or our ablest correspondents; it has, through one of its agents in Boston, endeavored—but signally failed—to prove us frauds; it has brought to its aid anonymous writers, especially "one of the most eloquent and popular Eastern lecturers," to belie us; it has other hornets in its interest; its leading editor (sub rosa) writes from five to seven columns each week, he says, without remuneration, solely "for the good of the cause," when in reality it is to gratify his inordinate vanity and vicious self-esteem.

That paper has accused us several times of being in collusion with a Philadelphia publisher, in order to induce its readers to believe we were mercenary. We brand the calumny as an infamous falsehood. We hav always counseled peace in our ranks, and none hav striven with more assiduity than ourselvs to promote it. Still the Journal deliberately misrepresents us; and again we asseverate that we hav not, either by voice or pen, counseled with Mr. Roberts in his attacks upon that paper and its management. We make this statement only because our veracity has been called in question. If the publisher of the Western sheet had fulfilled his duty, he would hav set his readers right upon this point long ago. But policy is his governing feature, and sensationalism for gain his impelling motiv. This is self-evident.

Did we allow these attacks to pass any longer uncontradicted, some might infer that we were culpable. Hence we enter upon the disagreeable duty of holding up these Chicago conspirators, these Spiritualistic leeches, that honest men and honest women all over the world may no longer be deceived by them.

A Post-Office Inquisition.

Confederate Brigadier Mahone does not appear to be content with the notoriety he has already achieved. He has now invoked the aid of the post-office department to keep up his fame.

The following postal card, addressed to Senator Vance, of North Carolina, but intercepted at the Washington post-office and never delivered to him, was the basis of an information lodged against the writer by one W. T. Henderson, an inspector of the post-office department, charging a violation of section 3,893 of the revised statutes:

"Please send me yr speech on that damm dog Mahone.
"JOHN CARMICHAEL,
"March 31, 1881. Middleburg, London county, Va."

The words used are not actionable, even if "damn" had all the force that Carmichael probably intended it should hav to express his scorn of Mahone. Section 3,893 says:

". . . No postal card upon which indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed shall be carried in the mail."

This is the flimsy foundation for a prosecution which would be amusing but for the principle involved and for the facts that were disclosed before the commissioner. That Mahone instigated it is manifest, and that the department became the instrument of his small revenge was made quite clear in the examination.

James E. Bell, superintendent of the city delivery of the Washington post-office, was the chief witness. He testified as follows:

"Q.: By what authority did you read that postal card? Do you know that it was positivly prohibited by law? A.: Yes; but I considered it my duty and took the risk.

"Q.: What regulation givs you the authority to peer into the mails? A.: I considered the card obscene and unmailable.

"Q.: In your experience, as you say, of seventeen years, hav you ever known a case of prosecution like this? A.: Never in the Washington office.

"Q.: Is it your habit to suppress postal cards? A.: Frequently. For example, abusiv postal cards are almost daily received against the President, but they never reach him; we burn them up. . . ."

He further stated that the postmark showed the card had passed under the eye of the Postmaster-General.

Upon a most frivolous pretext, and without color of law to justify it, the private correspondence of a citizen is stopped at the post-office in Washington, and with the privity of the head of the department, merely to gratify the resentment of the repudiating senator from Virginia. The clerks, with the consent of Mr. James, make inquisitions into the mails, and, as Bell testified, "take the risk" of arresting what matter they please in defiance of law. He confessed that it was "almost a daily" practice to suppress and burn postal cards abusiv of the President.

If this authority can be assumed by subordinates without restraint, where is it to end? What security is in the mails when clerks at the terminal points, right under the eye of the Postmaster-General, and, as appears in this case, with his full knowledge, may seize and destroy correspondence regularly posted and paid for?

This postal card was the property of Senator Vance. It was deliberately withheld from him by the officials of the Washington post-office after full consultation among themselvs. In that act they committed a felony, and, as an example and a protection to the public at large, every one of them should be sternly prosecuted under section 3,892 of the revised statutes, as follows:

"Any person who shall take any letter, postal card, or packet, although it does not contain any article of value or evidence thereof, out of a post-office or branch post-office, or from a letter or mail-carrier, or which has been in any post-office, or branch post-office, or in the custody of any letter or mail-carrier, before it has been delivered to the person to whom it was addressed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, or to pry into the business or secrets of another, or shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy the same, shall, for every such offense, be punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or by both."

The insolence of office is past bearing. Private rights are constantly outraged, and public interests are sacrificed by the audacity, corrupt connivance, and insulting defiance of the servants of the people. They form a close corporation, organize rings, plunder at pleasure, and then ask taxpayers, as Tweed did, What are you going to do about it?

[Commenting upon the case, the Sun says:]

The Carmichael postal card case is likely to be famous. John Carmichael, a Virginia farmer, addressed to Senator Zebulon Vance a note saying, "Please send me yr speech on that damm dog Mahone." This communication, which is undoubtedly as bad in taste as in spelling, never reached the person for whom it was intended. A clerk read the card in the Washington office and called the attention of his superiors to the language used. The missiv was impounded. The writer was arrested on the affidavit of an inspector of the department, and, after a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner, was held for trial on the criminal charge of mailing indecent matter, in violation of section 3,893 of the revised statutes, "and against the peace and dignity of the United States."

Carmichael's trial is set down for the day after the fourth of July. If he is convicted, it will be within the discretion of the judge to sentence him to a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment at hard labor for ten years.

The question directly involved, of course, is not whether Mr. Mahone can be described with accuracy as a "damm dog," or whether it is proper and polite to call him a "damm dog," or, indeed, whether the epithet is libelous, but whether the words used by Mr. Carmichael to convey to Senator Vance his opinion of Mahone are "indecent." The law under which Cramichael is prosecuted is designed to prevent the dissemination of obscene matter through the mails. Mr. Bell, superintendent of the city delivery of the Washington post-office, who intercepted the postal card addressed to Senator Vance, swears that he considers it "obscene and unmailable." The United States Commissioner at Alexandria, who held Carmichael for trial, is apparently of the same opinion.

Farcical as the proceeding is in some of its aspects, it has a side which is far from being comic. If post-office clerks are to be censors of the worthiness or unworthiness of the sentiments contained in the private correspondence intrusted to the government for transmission, and if they are commissioned to decide what messages shall be forwarded and what messages confiscated and suppressed, it is high time the public should understand the fact.

Music.

The Infidel world is behind in music. It is a matter I consider ought to receive the attention of at least a few of us. I want to call the attention of TRUTH SEEKER readers once more to this important issue. I am no humbug, will do what I agree to. If there are any that read this that will send me $1.00 and music paper, I will arrange them a fine piece of music for six instruments, first and second violins, and fill out with what additional instruments they may use.

Aurora, Ohio. B. O. FENTON.

The founders of Egyptian civilization established customs which their successors petrified into unchanging laws. They did it, no doubt, with the best of motivs. They adored the grand and noble wisdom of their fathers; whatever came from them must be cherished and preserved. They must not presume to depart from the guidance of those godlike men. The children must paint as their fathers painted, physic as they physicked, pray as they prayed. The separation of clans which they had made must be rendered rigid and eternal.—Reade's "Martyrdom of Man."

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Fifteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I scarcely attempted, as you complain, to answer one of what might satirically be called "arguments" advanced in your last letter. I did not do it because I could find nothing to criticise that to my mind was argument, the greater part of the whole letter being a mere elaborated repetition in a series of tautological interjections of the contents of previous letters, and which had been previously answered.

In the absence of argument to criticise, I seized the opportunity to suggest a better way of finding truth and a manlier mode of argument than irony, caricature, and vituperation. I also suggested that repetition and irrelevant side issues had better be omitted, and I took occasion to admire the style of Greg and Newman in preference to a coarse, hit-or-miss manner, pointing out some things that had been introduced which had absolutely no bearing upon the thesis. Surely these remarks must have commended themselves to you as eminently just and proper. If I had introduced in every letter, and without any excusable pretense, such vituperation of any of the prominent Infidels, Voltaire, Paine, Rousseau, Diderot, and others whose lives are certainly open to criticism, as you have of Christians, you would realize how burdensome it is to reply and feel the utter discourtesy of such a course. I deny that I have manifested such lack of consideration as you have, or shown such discourtesy in criticising Infidelity as you have in writing of Christianity. If I have, you can point out the place; if you do not, it will be a tacit admission that you have made an erroneous charge.

What earthly bearing has the character of John Calvin upon the truth of the scripture? This is the second letter wherein you have wasted considerable space to animadvert upon him. Is there no evidence of weakness in your support of such methods of argument? And where, pray, did you derive the authority to call Calvin my "patron saint" or to say that I "greatly admire" him or believe that he "possessed the true spirit of Christianity?" Not from anything I have said or written. Would it not be wise for you to refrain from making assertions as to my views and opinions of men until you have heard me express them? He is not, as you say, the originator of that system of truth universally miscalled Calvinism. The same views were taught a thousand years before him by Augustine, and are the foundation of the Pauline doctrines. I derive my belief solely from an intelligent reading of the New Testament.

In regard to the evils of professing Christianity, you know there is very little dispute of it on my part. But is it so that the most powerful, the most wealthy, most tyrannical people on earth to-day are professing Christians? Are they indeed the leaders of the fashions, the popular candidates for political power and worldly distinction? I admit it, but it is not Christianity, but a hybrid corruption—a Christianized paganism—that presents such features. The New Testament gives no support to it. Fancy the professed disciple of a carpenter's Son, a man who had no rights in this world, and of whom the last the world saw was a malefactor's crucifixion—fancy these people insisting on their rights and their dignity; it is ridiculous. It is true that those who are told to offer their other cheek when smitten go to law with all the eagerness of men of the world; it is true that they who are commanded not to be conformed to the world are among its most suppliant time-servers, and even Christians hold office and exercise power in a world where their Master was an outcast, and upon whose governments the blood of the Son of God and their Savior is resting. But it is to such that their Lord is saying: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou wert cold or hot; so then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked." Ah, I believe that the judgment of the Lord upon Christendom, that which professes to be his representative but is a liar, will be worse than the judgment upon open Infidelity. But Christendom is not Christianity, but its corruption, the field where the wheat and tares grow together until the time of separation. But it will be no excuse in that day for any soul that its neighbor was a hypocrite or acted inconsistently, and it is no objection to the truth of scripture that its professed followers are disloyal to its teachings, but rather confirms the truth of its many prophecies of the apostasy of Christendom.

But let any man honestly seek to obey the teachings of Christ; let him forego worldly station, wealth, and ease; let him leave the government of the sin-cursed world to its own advocates to take charge of, and let him faithfully preach the truth as it is in Jesus, the lost condition of all men by nature, their everlasting destruction without faith in Christ, and live as men waiting their Lord's return, and they will find that the same world that crucified their Master would also crucify them, and even his professed ministers would often call them fanatics and fools. Alas! you see nothing but the foul, outward shell; for the kernel you fail to look.

I should have thought that you would have left to the reader further discussion on the existence of evil. I have said that the Bible teaches that God is all-powerful and all-good; that evil exists, but not by his decree. I believe these statements. You cannot reconcile them, and so will not believe them. But inasmuch as you promised to criticise the character of the God of the Bible, and not such a character as your logic inclines you to picture, I can only again assert that your criticisms are irrelevant. To use a very homely and inadequate comparison, if I asked your opinion of a piece of blue cloth, and you took a piece of black cloth, insisting that it was the blue, I would put little value on the merit of your criticism as to the particular cloth I named. Even if it were an honest case of color blindness, others could appreciate your mistake. Whatever end your logic may lead you to, God did not make man as he is. And as to the propositions, as you call them, of Epicurus, I accept them. Let me ask you, though (for the existence of evil is as damaging to your views as to mine), How did evil originate in the universe? I have put this to you before, but you have conveniently overlooked it. Will you now be kind enough to answer, and also to pay some regard to what I have asked you as to the proofs that, if there is no God, incest, adultery, or fornication is wrong?

It seems strange to think that any reader would fail to observe how much you take for granted, or what immense importance and authority you exhibit yourself as believing lies in your mere dictum. You assert with all the confidence of a final authority, and as if it were the plainest axiom, that "nature has no use for a god for her work," etc. How do you know? What is your proof? How do you know that the conception of a god arose in the days of superstition? How do you know that man ever existed without a belief in God? Nay, I assert that you cannot prove that there ever was a time when men had no belief in God. If you do not prove it in your next letter, let us agree that I am right.

In answer to your paragraph that all conceptions of the god have been the reflection of the moral characteristics of the nations who originated them, there may be some truth in it; but I think it is far more exact to affirm that, with the exception of the Jews and Christians, and possibly to some slight extent the Mohammedans, the people have been morally the reflex of their gods. Thus the worshipers of Thor have delighted in a mythology of coarse, bloody revels, and the people were the same, a race hardy, bloodthirsty, and pitiless. Where the gods have been amorous, the people have been sensual, etc. What I object to in your paragraph is the implication that people had moral characteristics before they had ideas of a God. But the whole thing is conspiciously inexact and careless in its statement that the Jews have been no exception. The history of the Jews is in no wise a transcript of the character of Jehovah. They were a people almost incorrigibly addicted to idol-worship, one of the greatest crimes, according to the commands of Jehovah. Now, in this regard, did a nation of idolators put it into the mouth of their God to repeatedly denounce that to which they were most devotedly attached? I put this to you as a most curious problem: that of all nations, as Renan says, the Jews have given the first and only real system of monotheism, yet they were constantly running into the grossest polytheism, constantly neglecting the worship of their own God to follow the rites of strangers, incurring, according to their own sacred books, the heaviest penalty of the divine displeasure.

I might observe in passing that after the pages of lugubrious complaint you have made as to my alleged contempt for your authorities, and the inordinate vanity which you have imputed to me on account of my alleged cavalier manner, it is quite amusing to read that you do not care a straw what the Duke of Argyll's conclusions are in his new work. His grace is certainly as able and scientific an authority as any you can produce, and his conclusions certainly demand and are receiving great attention from those you acknowledge as masters.

As a final remark on the so-called anthropomorphism of the scriptures, let me ask you to frame a paragraph describing any act of a supreme power without using anthropomorphic language. I do not believe you can do it. If you can do it, you will; if you do not, let it be understood that you cannot. (You will notice I have several times used this form of challenge. It is a plagiarism from your letters.) If you cannot, you will have experienced a reason why the scriptures often use metaphor that seems to clothe the Almighty with human qualities.

Let me again press you for some solution of the problem of the existence of evil in the universe and such terrible suffering. Why is it? Accepting for the occasion your own belief in the potentiality of matter, it almost seems as if the mindless, purposeless agency that worked all things thought and purposed. It almost seems as if each creature was formed with a view of adapting it to existing circumstances equally as nicely and exactly as if a living, intelligent, and preëxisting spirit had been exhibiting his handiwork. And you say there is no sin, no offense against this unintelligent although wonder-working matter. It cannot be enraged nor offended; has no moral qualities, no likes or dislikes. Why did it not, then, make only happy beings, and bring them only into a happy world? Why did it make water capable of drowning as well as cleansing and assuaging thirst? Why does fire destroy life and cities as well as preserve from cold and prepare food? Why does the sun suffocate, the winter freeze? Why do flowers so often give poison instead of inspiriting perfume? Why is it necessary to support life by preying on other lives? Oh! why is there so prevalent and exquisite a capacity and preparative for suffering? Why did nature establish this universal inquisition? The scriptures, however, present a different view. The existence and demerit of sin makes that clear which otherwise is all darkness, and removes the blot that seems to stain the character of the creator.

God is positively good.

All that is contrary to God is evil.

God created all beings and things perfect. As far as this earth is concerned, this creation may be divided into thinking and non-thinking classes.

The former he endowed with the mental and moral faculties, the power of choice, and of the responsibility for it; the latter he put under irresistible and unchangeable laws.

The former, therefore, in the use of choice, could choose the negative of God, but it was not created with this bias; the latter could not make any responsible choice of itself. Man (who is the former) had the result of such negative choice fully explained to him, and could resist and fully overcome it if he chose.

The consequences of this negative choice would be intense loss, suffering, and impurity. The results of a positive choice, or choice according to God, would be intense gain, bliss, and purity.

God determined to allow man to exercise his own volition without interference.

If this had not been so, there could be no such thing as virtue.

There could be no such thing as moral obedience and duty.

Man, deliberately and conscious of the consequences, chose to sin. God permitted it.

If he had not permitted it he could not have shown mercy. Therefore one of his attributes would have remained unknown throughout eternity.

Should God have destroyed the only spring of virtue?

Should God fear man receiving such suffering as by his own voluntary choice he brought upon himself, and therefore balk his own plans and wishes?

These are some hasty thoughts which occur to me. Perhaps it would be better not to hazard them, since scripture is silent on the reasons of God's permission of sin. However, this permission of sin was certainly not evil or malignant. And consider now the preponderance of glory above what even unfallen man possessed is offered to those who will receive the gift of God, and all harshness disappears.

As to your views as to what Jesus should have taught, that he should have anticipated inventions, taught science, etc., I am willing to let them go uncriticised. To you sin, that persistent indwelling corruption, which even the heathen acknowledge and deplore, is a small thing compared with intellectual ignorance. But to my mind it seems much more reasonable to suppose that a being come down from heaven would teach not things which the human mind can invent or discover, but those truths which are above the research of men. It seems more important to me that a man should know how to act toward his Maker, to know his Maker's will, to seek his favor, to cleanse himself of the evil thoughts and feelings of his heart, even if he be ignorant, than to seek after the luxury and intellectual wealth of the world. It seems not unreasonable to me to bestow more thought on the eternity which awaits all of us than the few years that fall to us on earth. Nevertheless I believe Christ knew absolutely every invention, every science, every thought, even, that ever came into the mind of any man since or that ever will, even to your quibble and my present writing. Without arguing the point, however, I will correct a characteristic error and conclude. Where the narrative says that the devil showed Christ all the kingdoms of the world, the word translated "world" is more properly land, elsewhere confined to the land of Judea; so that the idea of the passage is that he was shown all the kingdoms lying at the foot of the mountain.

The scriptures are easily understood, but, as it is written, "none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." Nor are commentators and expositors, however helpful a necessity for those who are Christ's, for they have dwelling in them the Holy Spirit, who will teach them. G. M. MAIR.

The Declaration of Independence a Masterpiece.—But How it Got Mutilated!

The strictures of "A Hater of Shams" on the style of the Declaration of Independence, partly sensible and just, but partly trivial and hypercritical, will, I am sure, when properly examined, understood, and applied, only serve to fix more firmly the authorship of that great masterpiece on Thomas Paine. Indeed, I am glad they hav been made just at this time, for they hav enabled me to discover new evidence, which otherwise might never hav been detected.

A few weeks ago I made an attempt to reproduce, from the fac-simile of the so-called original draft of the Declaration in Jefferson's hand-writing, the exact words he wrote, or copied from a prior draft, before he submitted his paper to the sub-committee. The written document, as it exists, is full of erasures and interlineations, made mostly by Jefferson himself, but, generally, no doubt, at the instance of others, either in the committee or in Congress. A few are in the handwriting of Adams and Franklin. It is quite likely that when the report was made to Congress several drafts were prepared, and some of them preserved. Hence we hear of several "originals." John Adams had one, Franklin another, it is said, in England, and Richard Henry Lee another. I follow the fac-simile in Jefferson's works.

The gentleman from Connecticut has submitted and criticised the first paragraph and part of the second as amended and adopted by Congress. I now submit the same portion as it existed before a word was erased or interlined. And this I shall presume to be the work of Paine, though it is quite possible that his careful composition was somewhat marred by the transcribing hand of Jefferson. Indeed, I suspect that in a few instances Jefferson changed the language by inserting words of his own. The words erased in committee or congress will be indicated in italics, without giving the substituted language:

"When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for a people to advance from that subordination in which they hav hitherto remained, and to assume among the powers of the earth the equal and independent station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the change.

"We hold these truths to be sacred and undeniable, that all men are created equal and independent; that from that equal creation they derive all rights inherent and inalienable, among which are the preservation of life and liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these ends governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government shall become destructiv of these ends it is the right of the people to altar or abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

It will at once be seen by the gentleman from Connecticut that several, if not all, of his most important criticisms do not apply to the above, but to the amended document. Nevertheless I will proceed to restate and answer them seriatim.

1. "When in the course of human events." Did Paine write that? No, says our critic, for he knew that events cannot properly be spoken of as having, or coming in, a course, And how about "human?" Are there any human events? Human affairs there may be, but who will define a human event?

Answer: This is a hypercriticism. Webster givs as synonyms of event, "Incident, occurrence, adventure," etc., and remarks that an occurrence has no reference to any antecedents; and therefore, in the Declaration of Independence, occurrences would hav been out of place.

But now let us see how Paine uses the word event. I turn at random to the last four pages of "Common Sense." Alluding to the alarming condition of things in America he says:

"The Case [the critic will understand why I capitalize and italicize this word,, if no one else does] never existed before, and who can tell what may be the event?"

"This line [i.e. armed defense] is a line of consistency, . . produced by a chain of events of which the colonies were not the author."

"The birthday of a new world is at hand, and a race of men, perhaps as numerous as all Europe contains, are to receive their portion of freedom from the events of a few months."

Here are three instances, on three successiv pages, of the use of the word "event," and they all refer to "human events," not "cows' horns or harrows' teeth."

2. "To dissolve the political bands which hav connected them with another."

Could Paine hav been guilty of so incorrect a figure? Can bands (cords, ropes, etc.) properly be spoken of as dissolvable?

Answer: Certainly, if they happen to be made of soluble material. Has not many an iron band been dissolved with nitric acid?

But we don't know who made that amendment, and I presume that "bonds" were intended instead of "bands"—though the two words are quite synonymous. The probability, however, is that the amendment was suggested by this clause in the last paragraph of the original Declaration, "We utterly dissolve and break off all political connection." That doubtless was written by Paine. What objection to that?

3. "And to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them." Did not the author mean, "to the occupancy of which;" and if so, why didn't he say so? And are the "laws of nature" made any stronger by calling them the laws of "nature's God?"

Answer: By transferring "to" to the end of the sentence the meaning is made clear and the grammar correct; but it breaks the rhythm and ends the sentence with a particle. So, too, the insertion of the redundant words "nature's God" improves the rhythm; and perhaps Paine (or Jefferson, if you please) thought it politic to put a little God in the Declaration.

4. "A decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation." What separation? There is nothing antecedent but talk about the necessity of it. And who ever heard of an *in*decent respect? And why apologize for assuming a necessity?

Answer: There is no "separation," nor even "separate," in the original draft; therefore this criticism, though just, does not apply. For "separation" read "change."

In the first letter of Junius one sentence ends with "decent," and the next begins with "respect." These were favorit words with Junius and Paine. "Decent" means "suitable in words," etc.; "becoming, fit, decorous, proper, comely." Prefix the negativ to any one of these adjectivs, and see how it would qualify "respect." For example, I hav an "*im*proper respect" for such hypercriticism.

An apology for a necessity is certainly proper. But this apology had a grand purpose. Paine sought to unite and inspire the hearts of the American people to feel as he felt when he wrote that famous letter to the king, in which, with prophetic fervor, Junius said:

"Looking forward to independence, they might possibly receive you for their king; but if ever you retire to America, be assured they will giv you such a covenant to digest as the presbytery of Scotland would have been ashamed to offer to Charles II."

(And here I beg to make a digression by quoting the next sentence, to wit, "They left their nativ land in search of freedom, and found it in a desert." In Dickinson's draft of the Declaration, or Memorial, of 1775 occurs this passage, "Our forefathers . . . left their nativ land to seek on these shores a residence for civil and religious freedom . . . in the inhospitable wilds of America." Again, in the Declaration of 1776 a like sentiment is expressed, and, what is more remarkable, not only do the passages in the two Declarations parallel in sentiment, but in language, showing that the latter is certainly borrowed from the former. But Jefferson did not write the passage in the Declaration of 1775, and he says that in drafting that of 1776 he turned neither to book nor pamphlet. True enough, for the draft was already prepared by Paine, who doubtless also had a hand in Dickinson's Declaration of 1775.)

5. "We hold these truths to be self-evident." Then why proclaim them?

Answer: The original draft reads, "sacred and undeniable." But even as changed to "self-evident," are there not multitudes who deny them? Among whom, I am sorry to say, seems to be our astute critic.

6. "That all men are created equal." How? Not morally, intellectually, physically, or so forth!

Answer: Certainly not. Who but an idiot or lunatic would affirm it? But why divide the sentence? Take it complete, and then discuss its meaning.

7. "That they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." "Unalienable," says the critic, means "incapable of being put off." How, then, could anybody hav lost his liberty or suicided in America since 1776? And what a queer thing to be endowed with is a "pursuit!" And the author doesn't say "right to life, liberty," etc., but makes life and liberty synonyms of rights.

Answer: "Inalienable" is defined by Webster, "Incapable of being put off, alienated, or transferred to another." Complete liberty and independence are even yet a great way off, if ever attainable; but the American Revolution was a long stride in the right direction. The slave's "inalienable" right to himself has been forcibly taken from him and transferred to his master. Every philanthropist wants to help him recover it if practicable, and with it the right to "the pursuit of happiness," wherewith he has been "endowed" by nature or nature's God.

Technically, "life, liberty," etc., are not rights; but there is such a thing known to grammarians, and understood even by the illiterate, as an ellipsis in language. The best writers often indulge in it. But in this case the criticism does not apply, unless our critic raises a like objection to "the preservation of life and liberty" in the original draft. But in either case the ellipsis would bar the objection, for everybody understands exactly what it meant.

8. "That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men (not cats, says critic), deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." What rights, but the aforesaid inalienable ones? And how can government secure what is already secured and fixed fast as fate?

Answer: Cats and other domestic animals hav evoluted to their present state of liberty and happiness by the governments which men hav instituted over those primitiv wild beasts. And now in turn the evoluted cats, dogs, horses, etc., help mankind to govern themselvs, and other brutes. The "guffaw of the Guinea negro" (critic's words), who a few years ago was generally degraded to the condition of a cat, a dog, or a mule, is now beginning to be heard in the councils of the nation. And in my humble judgment that "wretched state paper' (critic's words), the Declaration of Independence, sowed the seeds of negro emancipation in America.

The word "rights" is an amendment for "ends" in the original draft. It is not an improvement. But governments are instituted to secure rights that are "inalienable"—that is, not transferrable to another except by force, duress, or fraud—in spite of the grammatical criticism of the gentleman from Connecticut.

9. "That whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends" (we havn't heard, he says, of any "ends" before) it is the right of the people to abolish it (i.e., the form, and leave the government standing) and to institute new government (with the old still standing) laying its foundations on such principles (below the foundations), and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness (while already in possession of the inalienable rights aforesaid)."

Answer: The word "ends" being found aforesaid in the original draft, the first criticism above does not apply.

How can you abolish the form of a government and leave the old government standing? Did the British government of the colonies continue after the close of the Revolution?

"Foundation" (it is singular in the original draft) means, "1. The act of founding, fixing, establishing, or beginnning to erect; 2. That upon which a thing is founded," etc. The foundation of a house may be laid on a rock or on piles, or on quicksand; so may a government, metaphorically speaking.

Our fathers of 1776 were deprived of the inalienable right of self-government, and they fought seven years to recover it. But the work was only partially done, and perhaps never will be completely done. Is it possible that the gentleman from Connecticut denies the self-evident truth that all men are created equal in regard to the right to life, liberty, etc? Will he or anybody else deny that I, or the meanest black man, has not an equal right with himself to "the preservation of life and liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?" That is exactly the meaning and the expression of the Declaration, and it is folly to deny so self-evident a truth.

The gentleman attributes that portion of the Declaration containing the statement of grievances to the hand of John Adams. This is expressly contradicted by Adams himself, who says Jefferson prepared the whole, and that when they two met to con it over he (Adams) does not remember making or suggesting a single alteration. He forgot, however, that he made two or three verbal changes with his own pen. But could either the pen of John Adams or Thomas Jefferson hav described a grievance like this last one in the list?

"He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of INFIDEL powers, is the warfare of the CHRISTIAN king of Great Britain. Determined to keep open market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negativ for suppressing every legislativ attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce. And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people on whom he has obtruded them, thus paying off former crimes committed against the LIBERTIES of one people with crimes which he urges them to commit against the LIVES of another."

This most eloquent paragraph of the Declaration was stricken out unamended. Speaking of it, Prof. Denslow says, "The English language possesses no clause more elaborate in its rhetoric." And of the Declaration as a whole, Col. Ingersoll says:

"Certain it is that Jefferson could not hav written anything so manly, so clear, so convincing, so faultless in rhetoric or rhythm."

But the gentleman from Connecticut, if I am able to understand and apply his criticisms, would emasculate the Declaration of all rhetoric and rhythm, and make it read thus:

When people want to break away from others and be independent, they ought to say why.

People hav an equal right to life, liberty, etc. Governments exist to secure these rights. Just governments are based on the people's consent. When a government won't protect them, they hav a right to upset it and make a new one that will.

Here is expressed in sixty words every material sentiment in the first one hundred and eighty words of the Declaration. But what a skeleton! Could such language as that hav enthused anybody? Such a death's-head and cross-bones in a Declaration of Independence, instead of rallying the patriots of '76, would hav frightened the goddess of liberty out of her senses and driven her into the Dismal Swamp.

Discussion.

Our Sixteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I am sorry that after all the pains I have taken with you, after all the patience, candor, and fairness I have exercised, I fall so far short of pleasing you. I fear you are fastidious and hypercritical. You complain of my coarseness, irony, caricaturing, repetition, tautology, irrelevancy, discourtesy, animadversion, unfairness, etc., etc. It is evident you and I cannot become of one mind in the essentials we are discussing, or in the modes we employ. I cannot think I am guilty of the charges you make against me. I have tried to be fair, consistent, and truthful. Of course I have used some repetition; but so does every teacher. I remember when I was learning my a, b, c's and my a-b abs that the same lesson had to be repeated with great frequency. So in escaping from the ignorance of theological error and learning the a, b, c of truth and reason, the lessons have to be often repeated.

You do not appear to be a ready learner, and I sometimes fear you are so wedded to the old errors and shams that you will not easily take to the higher truths as I see them .More than once have I been reminded, when trying to point out the truth to you, of the old adage, "There are none so blind as those who will not see." As, however, there seems to be a difference of opinion between us, both as to the matters of discussion and as to my modes, we had better leave it with our readers to decide whether your charges and complaints are just or unjust, and, also, which of us has used the most argument—adduced the most proof. I cannot think they will be so severe upon me as you are; and, I hope, not so hard to convince.

To me you seem wedded to the most absurd, ridiculous, and untruthful system of religious belief that mankind have ever been dupes to. All the mythological systems abound in absurdities, but none have greater falsehoods, none such appalling horrors, as the Christian system. I would that you and all other men could see the truth as it is in nature and reason, and behold the falsehood as it is in mythology and theology; and to enable this light to be seen and enjoyed I am using such abilities as I have. If I am not perfect in my means and modes it is perhaps attributable to human fallibility.

In self-defense, however, I claim that I have not brought in any argumeut or subject irrelevant to the matters under discussion between us, nor have I commented upon any branch of the subject not introduced by yourself. If I have said more of the nature and character of God, and also of the origin of evil, than has been agreeable to you, it is because I deem these very important subjects—at the very foundation of Christianity—and most necessary to be properly understood. They are in no sense side issues, or irrelevant to our discussion. When you asserted the love and mercy of your God it devolved upon me to show that his character is exactly the opposite. If I have not been successful in my effort I can only say the proofs are not nearly exhausted; hundreds of quotations from the revered volume can be quoted to fortify me in my position. This question is inevitably a part of our subject and cannot be ignored. I am only sorry that the character of your God, as shown by his own book, is so bad that it pains you to hav the matter investigated. I have only hoped that the process of "line upon line and precept upon precept" might be successful in your ease.

I understood your fourteenth letter to be a kind of whine because of my "coarse, hit-or-miss manner" of exposing falsehood, and that you took consolation in the words of Jesus when he told his disciples that they would be despised, hated and spoken falsely of for his name's sake. The sophistry of your effort was at once apparent, inasmuch as you belong to the popular, powerful class and I to the one that is hated, despised, and falsely spoken of, and I deemed it quite legitimate that I was most entitled to the consolation to be found in the words of Jesus, and that it had been the church from the early centuries that had been the oppressor and had done the hating and despising. I barely touched the subject. Volumes could be written in the same line. As to my hits and misses, I trust the hits outnumber the misses, and I apprehend they hurt quite as badly.

You complain because I alluded to John Calvin, but I have not done so oftener nor in any more uncomplimentary terms than you have to Thomas Paine. You have more than once alluded to his coarseness and have accused me of copying from him. This has not offended me. I consider him a far less coarse man than John Calvin, and I would not be at all averse to contrasting them in character and conduct, although probably no man has lived who has been more slandered and belied by Christians than has Thomas Paine.

I hope I did not hurt you by implying that you are a follower of Calvin. You ask whence I derive the authority for calling him your patron saint. Let me explain. When I first became acquainted with you I one day inquired to what denomination you belonged. You replied, "The Baptist." Knowing, then, that the Baptists, Presbyterians, and a portion of the Methodists are termed Calvinists, because they accept the peculiar views of Calvin and regard him as a leader, I felt justified in placing you where I did. I must, however, say that I have more respect for you when you say you don't admire Calvin, though you cannot deny that he is the founder of Baptistism, Presbyterianism, and Calvinistic Methodistism. I am sure a greater moral monster never lived—one of the great lights of reformed (?) Christianity. But after all he was a godly man. He was very much like the God you believe in. Ingersoll is heavenly-minded enough to perceive this truth; he says: "Calvin was of a pale, bloodless complexion, thin, sickly, irritable, gloomy, impatient, heartless, and infamous. He was a strange compound of revengeful morality, malicious forgiveness, ferocious charity, egotistic humility, a kind of hellish justice. In other words, he was as near like the God of the Old Testament as his health permitted." He continues in this way: "The best thing, however, about the Presbyterians [and Baptists] of Geneva was that they denied the power of the Pope, and the best thing about the Pope was that he was not a Presbyterian [Baptist]." But, as I said, I am glad you don't admire Calvin and that you are willing to say so. I would be glad, also, to hear you say you do not admire the God of Calvinism. How you or any person with a well-organized mind can admire such a God is a wonder to me. And how you can call such a God loving and merciful is equally strange. It is a bad perversion of terms and of the truth to call a being loving and merciful who created beings with insufficient self-control to withstand temptation, and created a tempter to decoy them, and a hell to burn them in, forever, for yielding to temptation.

You tacitly admit that Christians are not as good as they should be—that, in fact, they are not Christians. I judge you are nearly right in this opinion. Those who profess Christianity are so nearly like the rest of the inhabitants of the world that with a telescope or microscope little or no difference can be detected between them. They all worship gold, they are all fond of power, place, and pleasure, and their god and their religion are often all mere secondary considerations. You seem, however, to hold out the idea that there is somewhere a little select few, unknown probably to the ordinary world, but who are genuine Christians, who seek not to lay up treasures on earth, who turn the left cheek for a blow when the right cheek has been smitten, who give two dollars when importuned for one; who, when their cloak is stolen, reward the thief by giving them their coat also; who take no thought for the needs of the future; who have no more business on hand than the sparrows and are like the wild lilies growing in the field, which toil not nor spin; who, if they by prayer, fasting, or otherwise chance to obtain a shirt or pair of drawers, sell them and procure a sword; and if they have fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, wife and children, hate them all for Christ's sake. If you know of any such sect of Christians—the simon pure article—I ask you to point them out; I wish to see what manner of men they are. Do you think you are one of that kind yourself? So far as my observation has gone I see very little difference between Christians and non-Christians, between saints and sinners, save that the saints usually wear sanctimonious faces and look as though they would like, above all things else, to see their unbelieving neighbors burning in hell.

It will hardly answer for you to imagine a little band of true Christians somewhere who are able to live up to all of Christ's injunctions, and condemn all the others as hypocrites and pretenders. Neither is it reasonable for you to hold that we are not to take the ordinary, every-day Christians as the proper exponents of the system, and to say we are not to judge Christianity by them. We have to take Christians as we find them and as they are, not what they ought to be, or as you may dream they ought to be. We must judge of Christianity as we find it, not what you imagine it should be.

If those who like gold and silver and lay them up as treasures on earth, those who are fond of the pleasures and good things of the world, those who are quarrelsome and contentious, those who prosecute wars or sustain those who do; liars, swindlers, and robbers; those who grind the faces of the poor and oppress the needy, the Pharisees and long-faced hypocrites, those who seek to occupy the front seats in the churches and sit nearest the altar, those who despoil their fellow-beings of what is justly their own, those who are intolerant and oppressive in matters of opinion and would place fetters on the human mind—if all who are untruthful, malicious, covetous, ambitious, and unholy cannot enter into the heavenly Jerusalem, where the lambs are, and where they wear big crowns of gold, play upon harps of gold, where the dwellings are of gold, and where even the streets are paved with gold, but must be thrust down below, with the goats, into the dark smoke of pitch and brimstone, to roast and broil forever, I fear the future of Christians will be no more tolerable than the average of mankind, for they are no better.

If you occasionally find a good, kind man who is a Christian, you find a man who would be honorable upright, and truthful though he were an Infidel. That Infidels turn out a better average of men and women, so far as honor and integrity are concerned, than are found in the church there will be no difficulty in showing. It is but natural that men and women who have only their own deeds to depend upon for their happiness should be more careful in their conduct than those who think that the merits of another are to be credited to them, and that they themselves are to escape punishment because another has been punished in their stead. In my opinion, it is a false and pernicious system of morality which gives the assurance that justification or righteousness can be imputed from the innocent to the guilty, or that the highest virtue consists in belief, whether in accordance with evidence or in spite of it.

You still seem very reluctant to yield the point that God is responsible for the existence of evil, and though I have shown that if God is the creator of all things, all existences, with the full knowledge of the precise effects his creations would have, that he created man and woman and the devil, knowing that sin would be the inevitable result, you still insist that the Bible teaches that God is not the cause of sin or evil. I regard this as an evasion on your part, or an effort to screen your God from the malice and evil with which you say he is not fully guilty. If he is all goodness and opposed to the existence of evil, then he was very weak to allow it to come into existence, to continue for thousands of years after thousands of years.

You say the Bible does not teach that God is the author of evil. Let us see. You will certainly be willing to abide by what it does say upon the subject, and you must admit that God ought to know more about evil and how it came than you do. Isaiah xlv, 7, reads in this way: "I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil; I the Lord do all these things." In the following verse, after recounting his work, he says again, "I the Lord have created it." This ought to be satisfactory to you. If any part of the Bible is inspired it is the book of Isaiah. If any one of the prophets was authorized to speak for God it was this prophet. So if God is the author of a word contained in the Bible, he has positively declared that it was he who created evil. This, I insist, ought to be satisfactory to you, and you should no longer deny that God is the author of evil.

Other prophets confirm what Isaiah said of God: "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, Behold I will bring upon this city and upon all her towns all the evil I have pronounced against it" (Jer. xix, 15). "If that nation against whom I pronounced turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them" (xviii, 8). "Thus saith the Lord, Behold I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you" (xviii, 11). "I have set my face against this city for evil" (xxi, 10). "Thus saith the Lord God of Hosts, the God of Israel, Behold I will bring in Judah and Jerusalem all the evil I have pronounced against them" (xxxv, 17). "Now is the end come upon thee, and I will send mine anger upon thee. . . . An evil, an only evil, behold is come. And mine eye shall not spare thee, neither will I have pity; but I will recompense thy ways upon thee. . . . The sword is without, the pestilence and famine within; he that is in the field shall die with the sword, and he that is in the city famine and pestilence shall devour him" (Ezek. vii, 3, 4, 5, 15). "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii, 6). "He [the Lord] is gracious and merciful and repenteth him of the evil" (Joel ii, 13). "And God repented of the evil that he had said he would do unto them" (Jonah ii, 10). "Evil came down from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem" (Micah i, 12). "Behold against this family do I devise an evil from which ye shall not remove your necks; neither shall ye go haughtily, for this time is evil" (ii, 3). "The Lord repented of the evil he thought to do" (Ex. xxxii, 14). "I have set before thee death and evil" (Deut. xxx, 15). "And all evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads, and upon them came the curse of Jotham, the son of Jerubbaal" (Jud. ix, 57). "I have rewarded the evil" (1 Sam. xxiv, 17). "Behold I will raise up evil against thee" (2 Sam. xii, 11). "Now therefore behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee" (1 Kings xxii, 23). "The Lord shall bring on you all evil things" (Josh. xxiii, 15). "I will bring evil in the house of Jeroboam" (1 Kings xiv, 10). "Thus saith the Lord, I will bring evil upon this place" (1 Kings xxii, 16, and 2 Chron. xxxiv, 24). "Shall see the evil I will bring" (2 Chron. xxxiv, 28). "He will bring evil and not call back his words" (Isa. xxxi, 2). "I will bring evil from the north, and a great destruction." "Behold I will bring evil upon this people." "Thus saith the Lord, Behold I will bring evil upon them, which they shall not be able to escape; and though they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them." "I will bring evil upon the men of Anathoth." "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, Behold I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth his ears shall tingle."

"Wherefore their way shall be unto them as slippery ways in the darkness; they shall be driven on and fall therein; for I will bring evil upon them, even the year of their visitation, saith the Lord." For lo, I begin to bring evil on the city which is called by my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? Ye shall not be unpunished, for I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the Lord of Hosts. Therefore prophesy thou against them all these words and say unto them, The Lord shall roar from on high and utter his voice from his holy habitation; he shall mightily roar upon his habitation; he shall give a shout as they that tread the grapes against all the inhabitants of the earth." "I will bring on Judah all the evil pronounced." "I will bring my words on this city for evil and not for good." "I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith the Lord" (Jeremiah iv, 5; vi, 19; xi, 11; xi, 23; xix, 3; xxiii, 12; xxv, 29, 30; xxxv, 17; xxxix, 16; xlv, 5). "The Lord pronounced all this evil." "Behold this evil is of the Lord" (1 Kings ix, 9; vi, 33). "The Lord pronounced all this evil." "I have brought all this evil on this people." "God hath pronounced this evil on this place" (Jer. xvi, 10; xxxii, 42; xl, 2). "The Lord shall bring on you all evil things" (Josh. xxiii, 15). In 1 Kings xxii we learn of God sending an evil, lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets, that the people might be deceived and evil fall upon them; and the Lord spoke evil concerning them. There are many instances where the Lord gave evil instructions or advised such conduct as good men now regard as evil; for instance, the borrowing or stealing the valuables of the Egyptians by his chosen people, the taking of the cities and property from those they belonged to, and giving them to people who had no right to them, and numerous other similar evil deeds.

I trust you will now be convinced that the Bible and your system teach that God is the author of all things, evil as well as good. It seems appropriate that the daily paper Truth, in its Sunday sermon of last Sunday from the text, "As I have given you a land for which ye did not labor, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and olive yards which ye planted not do ye eat" (Joshua xxiv, 13), should open its discourse with these words: "Great God, what a God! and what a fool to thus proclaim his own iniquity! A being bad enough to do all that his revealed records allege that he did, and yet who poses before mankind as a beneficent spirit, the creator of the universe, ought to have been discreet enough to cover his bloody villainies with the cloak of silence. Perhaps, however, since his virtues are so few, it is only simple justice to accord him credit in this instance for candor." Later on these inquiries are made: "Is this a god of justice? Is this a god of mercy? Is this a god of truth? If it is just to take from those who labor and give to those who do not, by bloodshed, rapine, and cruelty, then he is a god of justice. If it is merciful to spare a harlot because she betrays all the people of her city, while slaying thousands of those about her—her victims—then he is a god of mercy. If it is truth to say, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and yet command wars and extermination for purposes of theft; if it is true to command, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and yet direct not only slaughter of men in unprovoked conflict, but also the murder of women and the slaying of babies, then he is a god of truth. All these things and more, and worse, this Jehovah did that he might, as stated by himself in the text, give unto the ancient Jews lands for which they did not labor, cities which they did not build, and vineyards which they did not plant. Candid men, whoever and wherever you are, is this your ideal of God?" The closing words of the sermon are these: "That may justify him [Joshua], but what a horrible god must have been his god! And yet we are asked to have this god for our god. In the light of the bloody history of that god, revealed by himself, how sincerely can we say, God forbid!"

You are mistaken when you say, "The existence of evil is as damaging to your views as to mine." It is not so. In reply to your inquiry, "How did evil originate in the world?" I will say that according to my views nothing in the universe ever originated. The universe always was in some form. Good and evil are relative terms. A thing is good or evil according to the use made of it. Order is good; disorder is evil. For instance, fire is good when used to warm us in cold weather and to cook our food, but it is an evil when it burns our dwellings, destroying houses and cities; and when used to torture us after death, it is hell, and of course evil. Water is good when used to allay thirst and supply the waste of the fluids of the body, to refresh growing vegetation, and in rivers and seas, to float barges, boats, and ships, but it is an evil when it descends with such force and rapidity as to destroy crops, wash away homes, and destroy towns and cities. Wheat and corn are good when used for food for men and animals, but when converted into alcohol and used as a drink to poison the blood and debase the human mind, they become great evils. There is probably nothing but what is good in its proper place and use, but may also become an evil when perverted to an improper use.

In the primitive ages of the human race it was thought that a perpetual contest existed between the powers of good and evil, between light and darkness, between heat and cold, or summer and winter. Thus the forces of nature became the gods and devils in which men believed. Personality, characteristics, and attributes were given to their gods and devils, and worship, oblations, and sacrifices were offered to them to please them, to appease their wrath and secure their good will. In former times the devil was as much worshiped and placated as God—in fact, devil-worship is the older of the two. The devil caused the pain and suffering, and if he could only be appeased by good offices they had little fear of the good being they called God. With many nations the sun was the representation of the deific principle in the universe, while frost and night were the opposite, or the devil. We see, then, that nature has furnished the models for the numerous gods and demons that men have devised. Nature has been the basis, to all ignorant minds, for all the mythologies and theologies that have existed, and the Jewish mythology is no exception to the general rule. That Yahweh or Jehovah was originally a nature-god I think I have quoted several passages to show.

I am glad that you accept the propositions of Epicurus. It is certainly much easier to accept than to disprove them. If you accept them you must come to the conclusion that the Jewish God is either very weak or very wicked, or both. It seems impossible to arrive at any other conclusion. He either will not or cannot destroy evil; he will not or cannot cause the human race to be happy. Dodge it as much as you will, quote scripture as much as you will, talk pious words as much as you will, you cannot escape these propositions.

You wish me to prove that nature has no use for a god. I think I demonstrated that by showing that the actions of nature are uniform, unfailing, and in obedience to innate, unchangeable laws. I hardly think you will insist that the sun cannot shine, the rain fall, the winds blow, the waves roll, streams of water run down hill, the grass grow, and all nature bloom, without the help of a god. You will hardly insist that a whole is not equal to two halves without the aid of divinity. How many thousand years ago it was that the idea of a god entered the superstitious mind I cannot tell you, but as it is known that man has progressed from a very low condition, but a trifle above the beasts of the forest, it is fair to conclude that there was a time when he had not even conceived of gods and devils, any more than the animals with whom he associated on terms of equality. That there are races of men now living in Africa who have no conception of God, and no word in their languages to express the idea of such a being, I think I can show by Livingston, Stanley, and other African explorers. When you assert that I cannot prove that there ever was a time when men had no belief in God, you state what is positively untrue. That time is even now; and if you wish it I will look up the proof and introduce it in my next letter.

You wish to know why nature is not more merciful, why water drowns, fire burns, and flowers giv forth a poisonous perfume. I can only say it is in the nature of things to be as they are, and for all results there are sufficient causes to produce them. Your question has no force unless the idea is held that all things are produced by an all-powerful intelligence. To one believing in such an individuality the existence of evils and woes seems like a great wrong and inconsistency. Believing, as you do, in a great designer, you have just grounds to consider him a very bad designer, a cruel, merciless monster. But I do not regard nature as a reasoning intelligence, nor as a designer, and hence she can be actuated by neither love nor hate, mercy nor severity. She is moved by innate, unchangeable laws, which are not amenable to pity or cruelty. I regard intelligence as the result of organization, the product of the brain and mental organs, as seeing is the function of the eye and optic nerves. Unless nature can be shown to have a brain and organs I cannot conceive that she can have intelligence, the reasoning power, or be moved by sympathy or tenderness. All we can do is to study her laws and adapt ourselves so far as possible to her inevitable conditions.

You are, however, wofully mistaken in thinking that the scriptures make creation and existence clear. They yield only falsehood and inconsistency and produce a far greater muddle, and far more uncertainty, than would otherwise exist. The Bible story of creation and the origin of evil is the most monstrous that could be devised.

You make another demand upon me "to frame a paragraph describing any act of a supreme power without using anthropomorphic language." Nothing is easier. If we imagine that God is infinite, extending wherever space is ever since duration was, how easy to speak of his universality, his immensity, his non-impersonality, his diffusability, his eternal presence! How easy to liken him to the light of the sun, the air, the ether, the qualities of duration and space, illimitable and almost inconceivable! How absurd, how ignorant, how imperfect, how misleading, how false, to speak of the infinite as having eyes, nose, mouth, ears, tongue, arms, hands, breast, bowels, loins, legs, feet, and back parts! Nothing more erroneous, nothing more false, can be conceived. The only rational conception of God is either that he comprehends all existences—the universe—all matter and force, or that he is an extremely light and thin material extending throughout all space, possessing possibly a density of a thousandth part of that of the luminiferous ether, and as near nothing as possible. Whatever God is, he is something or nothing. As no something has been found in any part of the universe that can reasonably be pronounced God, it is probably safe to conclude that God is nothing; and, also, that all the foolish conceptions that have been conjured up about him have been the result of grossest ignorance.

Now, as I have replied to your interrogations, I wish to propose a few questions to you which I particularly request you to answer, though you have hitherto evaded them: 1. You claim that God is not anthropomorphic. How, then, was it possible for him to beget an anthropomorphic son? 2. How is it possible for the infinite to hold commerce with a finite creature and produce an offspring? 3. Can the infinite beget the finite? Can the infinite be sire to anthropomorphism? 4. What do you know about God any way? 5. Will you give a few of the proofs that such a being, person, or infinite something or nothing has an existence? 6. Did he make the universe of nothing, or did he find some crude chaotic material already at hand? 7. If so, how came that chaotic matter to be in existence? 8. If you conclude that such matter always existed, is it not just as easy to conclude that the forces and laws inseparable from it also always existed? 9. If God did make matter, what did he make it of? If he did not make matter, what did he make? 11. What is God made of? 12. Who made him, or how came he into existence? Please tell me just how much you know of the infinite. 13. If you know nothing of it, what right have you to insist that I must accept your views?

Near the close of your letter you introduce some thirteen propositions, several of which appear to me opposite the truth. I cannot take the space to enter into a discussion of them at any length, but simply to take a passing glance and dispute what I consider untrue.

Your first is, "God is positively good." I pronounce this not true. It is very uncertain whether there be a God, and if there be one, he is as much evil as good, and even far more so. There is more of positive unhappiness than of positive happiness in the world. And if the hell theory is true, the evil predominates a thousandfold.

Your second, "All that is contrary to God is evil" is equally uncertain. If there is not positively a God, or if it is not positively known what he is, we cannot positively tell what is opposed to him, and cannot tell whether it is evil or good. From all we can learn from the Bible, he is the source of evil, and hence what is opposed to him is quite as likely to be good as evil.

Your third, "God created all beings and things perfect," is far from the truth. It is not known that he created anything, but if we admit that he did, it must be insisted upon that while pain, disease, sorrow, and wo exist, things are a great deal less perfect than omnipotence ought to have produced.

Your fourth is mere speculation, and wholly unproved.

Your fifth is of the same unproved character.

Your sixth is mere loose speculation.

Your seventh, about what God determined to do, has as little foundation in fact as the baseless fabric of a dream.

Your eighth belongs to the same pious fiction.

Your ninth means little or nothing.

Your tenth, about "man deliberately and conscious of the consequences chose to sin, God permitting it," is most untrue. Man was ignorant and inexperienced; he knew nothing about ultimate consequences, and did what he did in accordance with the nature God gave him. It was God who foreknew the consequences, who was conscious of all the misery which would be entailed, and who deliberately made all the factors in the business, and virtually decreed the result.

Your eleventh is as false as ridiculous. It was showing mercy with a vengeance to make a young man and woman without knowledge or experience, who he knew would partake of poison if placed within their reach, and then deliberately created the poison and placed it before them, he knowing they would partake of it. He was a thousand times worse than man or woman, for he had all knowledge and they had none.

Your twelfth, a conundrum, "Should God have destroyed the only spring of virtue?" is almost too profound for me, and I can hardly reach the hidden depth or its meaning. I will answer, however, Yes, if man would have been better off without it. If it was a delusive or deadly spring it was criminal in God to create it.

Your thirteenth, another conundrum, about man's voluntary choice and bringing punishment upon him-

More Notes.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Since my last writings for The Truth Seeker I hav visited Bronson, Coldwater, Quincy, Jonesville, Hanover, Concord, Tekonsha, Union City, Athens, Sherwood, Colon, and Centreville in the interest of The Truth Seeker and the principles of constitutional freedom which it clearly defines and faithfully advocates.

At Bronson I was hospitably entertained at the house of J. Francis Ruggles, the great bibliopole of the West. Mr. Ruggles has a fine and extensiv collection of rare curiosities and objects of especial interest. A life-size bust of Geo. Washington and one of Robert Ingersoll are among the first objects to attract attention. A very extensiv line of photographs of the most celebrated men and women of the past and present times afford a great pleasure to the observer. Coins of all nations and ages are presented, and papers published as far back as the fourteenth century and from that time up to the present. It is a rare pleasure to spend time in the laboratory of this intelligent and enterprising young man.

I was also invited to the hospitality of the residence of Dr. Geo. F. Rockwell and his family. It is woman's skilful hand which adds a charm of neatness and cheer to the festiv board.

I was invited to speak in Bronson the next time I am at the place, and, the lines being now so closely drawn and so well defined between Anthony Comstock—backed by the Y. M. C. A.—and the people's constitutional rights, I will speak upon these subjects when I am requested to.

At Coldwater I met with Dr. Brown and some other Liberals. But I think the church under its various denominations has a strong hold in this field of unusual wealth, fashion, and conservatism. There is much need of activ, intelligent, and earnest reformatory work in Coldwater and its vicinity.

At Quincy I found a stanch advocate of freedom and the general principles of Liberalism in the person of E. Mudge, Esq. Judge Mudge became a subscriber to The Truth Seeker, and through him its merits may be introduced more extensivly to the people of Quincy and its vicinity.

At Jonesville, among the activ Liberals I met were Lawyer Merriam, H. W. Tuller, and some others whose names I hav not at hand.

Hanover is the home of the Snows, who are well-known in all that vicinity as independent Freethinkers.

Concord is noted for its Universalism, which seems to be orthodoxy in blossom, or gone to seed. The world of mankind are slow to learn that the only true worship or devotion consists in an unreserved consecration to law or principle, and that all adoration paid to an unknown and incomprehensible divinity is only idolatry.

At Tekonsha we hav J. C. Budd, Dr. Rogers, J. W. Anderson, and others as intelligent workers in the cause of Liberalism and supporters of The Truth Seeker.

At Union City there are a score or more activ and earnest workers and supporters of The Truth Seeker. David Gifford, at this place, paid me nine dollars for the cause of freedom and the support of Liberal publications.

At Athens I was liberally and hospitably entertained at the residence of Mr. Spencer and at Mr. M. Doubleday's. Mr. Doubleday has one of the finest farm residences in St. Joseph county, and it is mentally illuminated with Liberal sentiments.

At Sherwood there are a few out-and-out Liberals. And there is a class or sect known as the Yorkites. A minister by the name of York came out from the M. E. church and is occupying about the same ground as Profs. Swing, and Thomas of Chicago. The supporters of this phase of religious faith are building a new church at Sherwood, and they also hav a "house of worship" at Athens. This class of progressionists is also quite numerous about Union City. But, so far as I know, they pay more attention to "religious worship" than they do to the aggressions of Comstock and the Y. M. C. A. upon the citadels of constitutional rights, and the indispensable requisits of personal freedom.

At Colon we hav a large list of subscribers for The Truth Seeker, which circumstance in itself indicates an activ, practical devotion to human rights and personal freedom, without which there can be no permanent deliverance from the mental slaveries of the darker ages. There are activ, earnest workers in the cause of Liberalism in Colon and its vicinity, of whom I should take great pleasure in speaking more definitely, but my present notes are more extensiv already than I had anticipated.

Centreville is a place of very especial interest to me, in connection with my feeble efforts in behalf of human rights. I was spending considerable time in Centreville about the time when the editor of The Truth Seeker was arrested by Comstock, and I was requested to speak in the court-house upon the signs of the times and the issues of the hour, and although there was a revival meeting then in progress and an excited multitude under the influence of the united clergymen of the place, I consented to speak in the court-house, and the whole church influence set in to defeat me in my professional business in the place. One good Christian woman wished to giv me "advice as a friend" not to say anything whatever upon religious subjects. I could do hundreds of dollars worth of work in the place if I would but keep still upon these subjects, but if I would continue to talk upon these topics I could not do anything in the line of my professional occupation, etc. I replied that I had walked away from all financial interest and superficial worldly glory forty years ago, and set out upon the wide cold Christian world naked-handed, leaving houses and lands and friends, and even lovers behind me; that I had married and raised my family and educated my children in my profession with my fingers, and I should not go backward now at this late day. Work or no work, I would "cry aloud and spare not" in times like these, when the church forces were sending the best people we hav to prison and to premature graves. And I feel the same spirit to-day. I will spend the balance of my life in laboring as diligently and intelligently as I can to redeem the race, and to save my country from the encroachment of a combined church power and a centralized political despotism.

A Great Victory in Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: "We hav met the enemy and they are ours." About the middle of January Prof. O. A. Phelps came here and gave three able lectures, which were well attended, and created much excitement and "holy horror" among the pure, pious churches.

He challenged the orthodox to discuss with him, through any champion they chose, the following proposition:

"Resolved, That the Bible is not of divine origin, is at variance with many established facts, and teaches a defectiv code of morals."

The Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists made no response, wisely foreseeing that "discretion is the better part of valor." The Campbellites or Christians—whatever might hav been the motiv—showed themselvs to be more manly, generous, and liberal, and showed more confidence in their ability to deny the proposition and "put down Infidelity," and chose the Rev. C. W. Pool, of Humboldt, Kansas, as their representativ and champion. It was confidently assumed and asserted beforehand that it would neither be a hard nor a long task to sweep away and demolish both Phelps and his proposition. A few old "blue-law" fossils said Phelps ought not to be permitted to propagate his opinions—that there should be a law to prevent him from so doing.

The discussion began on the 22d of February and was continued through eight evenings. It was held in the new, neat, beautiful, brilliantly-illuminated Christian church, and the expenses for light, fuel, usher, etc., were equally divided between the Liberals and Christians. The Methodists had been and were having "a great revival" when Phelps came to irritate and disturb them, and the minister advised the "lambs in the fold" not to go to the discussion, and kept up their meetings during four nights of the debate. The Presbyterians also held evening meetings and began them much earlier than the discussion opened. Both ministers kept as many from the debate as possible. A theater, also, was playing during four nights of the conflict, and the roads were so bad that many, several miles distant, could not attend. In spite of all these disadvantages and opposing forces, every seat was full, and on some nights a few stood up.

The three well-attended lectures of Prof. Phelps in January created much excitement, which was greatly increased during the discussion, and a few of the attendants had so little faith in their own religion that they could not bear the pressure of rigid analysis, criticism, and facts, and left.

"He who fights and runs away
Will liv to fight another day."

One Christian, one Infidel, and a third person chosen by them, sat as moderators during the debate.

It was glorious and happifying to see believers and skeptics, both male and female, meeting there eight evenings, shaking friendly hands, treating each other with respect, and sitting side by side, all mixed up, and nobody hurt in any sense, with a very few exceptions. Ah! reader, I was filled with unutterable emotions, which the silent tear came to relieve, as faithful memory took me back to from twenty to forty-five years ago, when I was often insulted and had things thrown at my head during my utterance of unpopular truth, and when not even a Universalist, much less an Infidel, was considered fit and good enough to sit with Christians in the same church or pulpit.

Each disputant spoke one-half-hour, and spoke twice each evening. Phelps affirmed the proposition four nights and closed with a fifteen minutes' speech. The proposition was then reversed and Mr. Pool affirmed and Phelps denied.

As I read mind and mental forces through the organism, I will here remark that both Phelps and Pool are naturally combativ and aggressiv in a mental sense, but their intellectual brains differ in form and development, and so do their methods of reasoning and proving their positions.

When the world learns that every man is what he is through his organism it will cease its self-righteousness and persecution and cease to enforce inhuman laws and demand impossibilities of human nature.

Mr. Phelps presented his platform of principles, logic, his scientific, mathematical, analytical, and irrefutable method and only true way of reasoning and arriving at truth, and his opponent did not and could not destroy or refute it, so I think. I wish to giv Mr. Pool all credit due him, and to represent him justly, and will say what I should hav said, in its proper place, that he is well educated, has a good memory, has read much, uses language correctly and critically, and is more fluent in speech than Mr. Phelps.

His attempts to prove the Bible divine were failures. His reasoning was not mathematical or scientific, for in mathematics and science we find no orthodox god, the source of the divinity claimed for the Bible. Unhappily for him, he was like the man who undertook to build his chimney at the top, but could not find support for his first brick. His repeated statement that if the major proposition be true the minor ones must be true also, was correct; but, alas for him! he had to assume (as Prof. Phelps told him often) the major proposition to be true, all the way through, without proving it. He was like Dr. Sewall, who wrote a book to refute phrenology, forty-five years ago, and asked Daniel Webster for his opinion of it. Webster read the book, and said to Sewall, "If your premises are true, your argument is conclusiv." But they were not true.

His argument to prove a God from design, or the Paley argument, was a complete failure to those who are in the light of nature and reason, and do not verify.

"A man convinced against his will
Is of the same opinion still."

Prof. Phelps pressed upon his opponent's consideration the book of Euclid, from a heathen source—a book without one error, used in all our schools, in contrast with the Bible, full of acknowledged errors; but he made no reply. He also paid no attention to several quotations made by Phelps to prove the Bible at variance with science, and that part of the proposition might better hav been left out, except to show unprejudiced minds that Pool could not reconcile many facts with his inspired, divine Bible.

Mr. Pool's labors to prove the divine origin of the Bible from the prophecies, the miracles, the resurrection of Christ, and the "perfect morals" thereof, were abortiv, for Phelps met and thwarted him on every point, by reason, by history, by facts, and by the Bible itself, and verified that "out of thy own mouth will I condemn thee." Mr. Pool quoted and repeated Greenleaf on what constitutes evidence, which no one, I presume, doubts; but, unfortunately for him, he could not produce such evidence to establish his propositions.

Phelps showed that the genesis of man was the result of evolution through continuous changes and differentiations of godless and uncreated matter. Mr. Pool tried to be facetious and witty on the idea that man was evolved from a monkey, but I hav seen more than one human being that was below the monkey in brain and intellect.

Evolution is a bitter pill for priestcraft and orthodoxy to swallow; and those who do swallow it are sure to be cured of that diseased and abnormal mentality which can believe such inhuman absurdities, the results of which were so emphatically and impressivly described by Mr. Phelps.

Mr. Pool and some of his brethren expressed great vity for Phelps, and I hav no doubt the pity was mutual and reciprocal. It seemed to me to be a trying position for the Christians to be in, to sit there and hear the nature and character and history of their God so truthfully portrayed and both their God and their God-derived and God-inspired Bible impeached in the name of truth and humanity. That Mr. Phelps could, with entire safety of person, thus talk to Christians, and criticise and condemn their impotent and baseless system of salvation, marks great progress in human development and manhood.

The closing scene, when Mr. Phelps, with sincere and friendly feeling, thanked the audience, the moderators, and his opponent for their patience, attention, and courtesy, was to me most impressiv and promising for humanity.

The chief value of such discussions is that they giv access to a class of hearers, and an opportunity to spread the light which in no other way could be obtained.

There is a great mental upheaval, and truth is coming to the surface. False gods are dying that humanity may liv. Phelps is a champion iconoclast, and Pool is an able Godite and idol-builder. I thank and bless them both for preparing the way for a better humanity and a higher life on earth. I could hav said much more, but space in THE TRUTH SEEKER is precious.

Orthodoxy, "thy sun is setting;
Thy glory waxeth dim;
Thy genius, his charge forgetting,
Chants forth thy dying hymn."

Underwood's Essays and Lectures.

I hav just finished reviewing for the third time B. F. Underwood's "Essays and Lectures" thee so kindly sent me some weeks ago, and I must tell thee how well I like them.

The book is a truly valuable one, and should be in every Liberal library. Underwood is a strong and logical reasoner, and his books are full of good, telling facts that make them very useful for reference.

The lecture on "The Influence of Christianity on Civilization" is splendid. It tells powerfully against the moralizing and enlightening effects of Christianity in every country where it has gained a foothold, and proves this boastful religion to be one of the direst curses that ever blasted the hopes of happiness of trusting, confiding believers.

The lecture on "Woman" is also an excellent one, and proves conclusivly that woman is fully man's equal in intellect and all that makes for righteousness. It shows that with equal chances for educational improvement she will be just as capable of making and executing good and wholesome laws as is her brother man. In closing this essay he says: "A man or woman needs not to be confined to one reform. We should be broad, liberal, cosmopolitan, giving all reforms a generous support and uncompromising aid every time we hav an opportunity, and for that reason I came here this evening and hav spoken in favor of woman suffrage."

The lecture, "Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint," interested me me most of all, because this "ism" is the last lingering remnant of the mythologies, and if once settled to be a delusion, the world will be rid of gods and ghosts, future lives will given up, and the now and to-day, the here and the known, will receive our highest and best labors for humanity. This little essay seems to cover a great deal of ground, and speaks volumes in favor of Materialism versus Spiritualism, and yet it is broad, liberal, and tolerant to Spiritualists themselvs.

In closing he says: "While I am no Spiritualist I think that Spiritualism, in the present transitional stage of thought, is doing a work that is much needed; . . . there is so much in the theory and history of modern Spiritualism that is in marked contrast to the popular theology; its teachings in many respects are so far in advance of those of the church; its literature so much more Liberal and in keeping with the spirit of the century; its press and its platform so comparativly free, and the intelligent and informed among its adherents so much more courteous and generous in the treatment of its opponents, that it has required from me something of a sacrifice of personal feeling to offer the criticisms which I hav uttered, and which I believe justice and impartiality demand."

Now I hope every good Liberal who feels able to do so will order a copy of this valuable work, and thus encourage the writer and the publisher to go on with their labors for reform, progress, and enlightenment.

The truth has only to make itself known to be accepted, loved, and appreciated. We all prize truth. Let us then help to giv it to the world. Let us

"Grasp the sturdy blade of reason,
Bright from thoughts within;
Cowardice is direst treason,
Ignorance is sin.
Nature's arsenal is ready,
Potent is her breath,
Liberals form, then, strong and steady,
Liberty or death."

Crimes of Preachers.

A pamphlet with the above caption, now ready for delivery, has been issued by the undersigned at Waverly, Iowa. The record will be kept up, and future editions issued, bringing the record to date.

Five years ago I commenced keeping an indexed scrap-book of items clipped from newspapers, giving the accounts of crimes committed by our reverend sky pilots. If I had been before astonished at a list of forty clerical villians, as published in the Cincinnati Commercial, and more astonished by a vastly-extended list published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, imagin my amazement when, after five years of this "labor of love," I found myself in a condition to publish to the world the names of almost five hundred ministers of God who, within a limit of less than one-fourth of the United States, hav been guilty of 200 adulteries; 23 bastardies; 28 bigamies; 25 cases of cheating; 26 of deserting wife and children; 27 of drunkenness; 23 of embezzlement; 21 of forgery; 29 of immoral assault on women; 27 of larceny; 11 of murder; 6 of perjury; 17 of rape, mostly on little girls; 22 of swindling; 102 of seduction; 11 of suicide; 4 of sodomy; and 6 of slander, besides a host of minor offenses. That is to say that preachers are guilty of more crime than any other class of men; that they commit crime knowingly, wickedly, and without the excuse of ignorance and want, which so often palliates offense.

The list published by me is alphabetically arranged and brief, as follows: "Anderson, Rev. J. S., Charles City, Iowa, M. E.; seducing wife of D. C. Haye. Bayliss, Rev. E. L., Maple River, Mich., Bap.; seducing Mrs. Phönix; state prison."

The list has been collated from the printed reports in papers, and will be continued. Will friends be so kind as to send me clippings from papers, with name and date of paper, for future issues of "Crimes of Preachers?"

The price of the pamphlet will be twenty-five cents per copy, six for one dollar, fifteen for two dollars.

"Spread the gospel!" M. E. BILLINGS.

Pay Up.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav made arrangements by which I shall be able to send thee the $10 I am owing thee for books before thee starts on thy trip. I hope every one who owes thee for the paper or for books will pay the last dollar of the debt, so thee will be able to start with a full purse and leave with the best of feelings toward all thy many worshiping subscribers. I do not understand how any one who reads and loves our dear TRUTH SEEKER can think of letting its honored editor leave for so long a journey and feel that they are owing him. I, for one, shall not enjoy a single step of thy trip unless I liquidate my money indebtedness before thee starts. Thy other numerous kindnesses and the great gifts of mental treasures I hav received from thee I can only repay by feelings of true gratitude and warm affection. Thine admiringly and earnestly,

Financial Economy for the Million.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been reading your remarks upon the corporations, consolidations, and monopolies; and during your discussion of them you ask, How can it be prevented? I answer, the remedy is very simple and sure; the great trouble is to get it stated to the people in the proper form so that they can see and appreciate their rights and see how they are wronged. Interest, in any form, is an outrage upon the laborers, who earn all wealth. There is no more justice in taking interest than in picking pockets; and those editors who will learn this truth, and proclaim it to the laborers and voters, with the simple and proper remedy, will be the greatest benefactors that ever walked the earth. It is the duty of every stable government to furnish its people with a full legal tender money, issued by the government itself (not delegated to banks or bankers), in sufficient quantities to pay all debts, public and private, at once, and never go into debt or oblige any of its people to ask for trust or credit. There should be so much money in circulation that no man would need to borrow one dollar. Then there would be no need of banks or pawn-shops. Such money would stay in the hands of those who need it to use, and would, like water, flush every part of our country. It should be received by the government at all times at par for all dues and for duties and taxes. With such currency so plenty, our prisons, jails, and workhouses would soon be vacant to rent for shops or other and better uses than as pens to stifle humanity.

No man would counterfeit a money so free that he could get it by earning it. No man would lie, steal, rob, or murder to get a few dollars if it was so plenty that he could get it for labor.

In 1865 there was in circulation 2,111,678,579 dollars of money for only the Northern states, about twenty-five million people, to use. No one was idle or begging or starving. Our jails and prisons were not crowded. But we had not money enough, for there were banks and pawnbrokers who could liv by loaning money. The South had no money, and there should hav been issued by the government four billion dollars more, and there would never hav been a panic or a business failure. Our cities would not hav grown so fast or become so corrupt. Our people would hav spread out all over the land, and money could not hav accumulated in the hands of a few, as it has. But instead of putting out more money, there was 1,808,314,475.69 of untaxed legal debt-paying money that drew no interest from labor, destroyed, and untaxed interest-bearing bonds put in place of it. To draw interest from those who labor, to put in the pockets of those who do not labor, that was the only way to procure an aristocracy, which can only liv upon a public debt.

Money has been contracted in about sixteen years from over two billions for twenty-five millions of people to about one-third that amount for fifty millions of people; so that one dollar is more valuable than ten dollars ought to be. And from the President of the United States to the lowest scavenger, judges, lawyers, ministers, men, and women, all are giving their lives and sacred honor, are ready to lie, steal, forge, rob, murder, anything, to obtain a small portion of that tool of exchange, which is their right and should be as free as water or air.

Yes, the remedy is simple; the only trouble is to drill the truth into the majority of the voters' heads so they will appreciate it. The cry of inflation has been a more cruel lash than the whip of the slave-drivers, yet no man ever saw a full legal tender money of any nation depreciate one farthing so long as the government stood secure and received its own money for all debts and dues. We should just as soon expect the postage stamps to depreciate as such a money.

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Never was this so truly applicable as to our land to-day. Already another panic is prophesied for this year. J. H. WOOD.

What Difference Does It Make?

It is acknowledged frankly by many of the leaders of ecclesiastical orthodoxy that the clergy and the church are drifting in their belief, or rather in their *un*belief. I hav observed for many years past that when clergymen convene in ecclesiastical council there seems to be an almost irresistible desire on the part of one or more of the speakers to transcend the limits of the creed and to dwell upon topics which the orthodox creed forbids them to investigate.

They all seem to be drifting, drifting. The past winter, one of the leading lights among the orthodox clergy stated to a crowded house in one of his regular sermons on the Sabbath that intelligent men and women no longer accept the creed of the church. They are unsettled in the faith. None but the ignorant know what to believe. A distinguished D.D. of this city, who is an associate editor of an orthodox paper, and who has a large pastorate, recently haranged the consociation with remarks which showed that he had drifted, and he must tell his brethren what wonderful discoveries he had made. Here is a specimen of what he said:

"What difference does it make with us whether the Bible was inspired or not? Suppose it was inspired—how are we to find out whether it was or was not? Then suppose it was inspired? and again suppose it was not? What are we to do about it? What difference does it make whether the forbidden fruit of which Father Adam ate was apple, pear, or orange? The Old Testament states that Elijah was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire. Now what difference does it make whether he went to heaven in a fiery chariot or on a bicycle or on a donkey, or whether he didn't go to heaven at all, or whether that story about him is simply an allegory? What difference does it make with us whether the whale swallowed Jonah or Jonah swallowed the whale? or whether that Bible story is simply an allegory written by some good old man who wanted to do right, but who was highly pleased at his own efforts to induce the people to believe his marvelous story? I say, what difference is it going to make with us whether we do believe such things or do not? Will it help us to be more honest, more truthful, more kind and affectionate in our families, to believe that the sun and moon actually stood still for the purpose of lengthening a long day of bloody warfare? What difference does it make whether the world is six thousand years old or six millions of years? We all want to be good, exemplary, law-abiding, peace-loving, and strife-hating citizens. We want to liv in peace with all men, do right, pay our honest obligations, and do no wrong to our neighbors. Now, then, is it going to help us and make us better to believe that Adam was created perfectly holy, after which he fell from his holy condition, and thus brought all his posterity, to the end of time, to an estate of sin and misery? We all need assistance to teach us how to liv right. Now, then, if we meet with anything in the Bible the belief of which will make us more manly and more womanly, more honest, truthful, and more estimable as worthy citizens, let us lay hold of it with all our faith, and get all the assistance possible from exercising implicit faith in any real or fancied efficacy to help when assistance is needed. If the heart and life are rendered better by making long prayers, pray and keep on praying all night. If it is likely to make a better man or woman of you to believe that the great creator of the universe sent down fire from heaven in answer to a petition of Elijah, and consumed the sacrifice, and burnt up the wood of which the altar was made, when it was soaking wet with water, and burnt up the stones and licked up the water in the trench, why, believe it. What difference does it make whether the narrativ is a sacred allegory, or whether such an occurrence did actually take place indeed and in truth?" SIGMA.

The correction of a historical error always pleases me, and I am always ready to acknowledge a mistake by myself. I said that Taylor's "Diegesis" was written during his second imprisonment in 1829. It now appears that that was his first imprisonment. More light is needed on the history of that remarkable man, and I hope Mr. Forder, of London, will furnish the matter he suggests. The "Diegesis" needs an alphabetical index.

ANTICHRIST.

is the merest bosh and twaddle. God had an eternity to mature his plans; man did just what God made him to do and just what God knew he would do. Man was the innocent victim, and God the criminal designer and monster. What supreme nonsense to talk about man's balking God's own plans and wishes! If the result is not as he wished it, whose fanlt is it? If he did not want it as it is, why did he not plan and execute differently?

Your subsequent moralizing about "the preponderance of glory above" of a few made blissful while countless millions are writhing in hell below, is too atrocious for respectful consideration. My whole being revolts at such "glory," and I pronounce such theological madness the most execrable that can be conceived. If such views as you entertain are the result of your being one of "the wise" who can easily understand, and if you, being "Christ's," have the holy spirit dwelling within you who teaches you, then I must deliberately assure you that I do not want to be one of the wise. I do not want any such holy spirit dwelling within me to teach me any such utterly absurd and villainous nonsense. I am extremely doubtful about the genuineness of your wisdom, and warn you to beware of that "holy spirit" you fancy you have within you.

I have taken so much space to expose your errors and sophistries that I find I have none for the early teachers of morality who preceded Jesus. I hope in my next to find room for these worthies.

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

LEETONIA, April 22, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 for your trip round the world which I promised. That you will enjoy your trip and return safe is the wish of you well-wishing friend, HUGH DALRYMPLE.

DAYTON, O., May 8, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I herewith send you $6—$1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5 for the round trip, with the hopes of your return, and I hope to hear of your return to New York and to your family safe. I am unwell, but hope to get your book and read some more of your productions on Christianity, etc.

Yours truly as a friend, WM. K. GERHARD.
